

NUNC COGNOSCO EX PARTE

THOMAS J. BATA LIBRARY
TRENT UNIVERSITY

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2023 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

THE LIFE
OF
FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE

CHIEFLY TOLD IN HIS OWN LETTERS

EDITED BY HIS SON
FREDERICK MAURICE

WITH PORTRAITS
IN TWO VOLUMES
VOL. II.

London
MACMILLAN AND CO.

1884

From University Library
Petersonoven, 1884.

DX5199 . M3A5 . 1884 v.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

PAGE

1849, LATTER HALF—REMEMBRANCES OF F. D. M. AT THIS TIME BY PROFESSOR BRENTANO AND OTHERS—THE MEETINGS WITH WORKING-MEN RESUMED—TENDENCY TOWARDS CO-OPERATION —LETTER FROM STUDENT ON NEWSPAPER ATTACKS—MAYHEW'S LETTERS ON "LONDON LABOUR AND THE LONDON POOR"— LETTER TO MR. HORT ON QUESTION OF FUTURE PUNISHMENT —PERIOD OF HESITATION BEFORE COMMITTING HIMSELF TO ACTION —1850—BEGINNING OF THE CO-OPERATIVE MOVEMENT—THE NAME CHRISTIAN SOCIALIST—LETTER TO MR. HORT ON A COURSE OF PHILOSOPHICAL READING—PRACTICAL DIFFICULTIES AND ACTION ON THEM—EXPLANATION OF OBJECTS AND VIEWS OF CHRISTIAN SOCIALISTS	1-49
---	------

CHAPTER II.

1850, CONTINUED—A GENERAL STORM OF OBLOQUY ASSAILS MY FATHER AND HIS FRIENDS—IN THE MIDST OF IT MR. SLANEY'S COMMITTEE REPORTS TO THE HOUSE OF COMMONS IN FAVOUR OF CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETIES—1851, AND JANUARY 1852—MR. HOLYOAKE LEADS THE ATTACK ON CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM AND IS FOLLOWED BY BOTH 'QUARTERLIES'—THE COUNCIL OF KING'S COLLEGE, ETC.	50-102
--	--------

CHAPTER III.

JANUARY 1852—SEPTEMBER 1852.

THE GREAT IRON TRADES STRIKE—UNWILLINGNESS TO URGE IMMEDIATE CO-OPERATION ON THE MEN; OR TO DO ANYTHING TO MAKE THE SPLIT BETWEEN EMPLOYERS AND EMPLOYED PERMANENT—MR. KINGSLEY'S 'WHO ARE THE FRIENDS OF ORDER?'—RENEWED CONFERENCES WITH WORKING-MEN—MR.

	PAGE
SLANEY'S BILL AT LENGTH GIVES LEGAL FORM TO THE CO-OPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS—THE CHARTER OF QUEEN'S COLLEGE OBTAINED SOON AFTERWARDS—MR. KINGSLEY'S 'PERSEUS' AND 'PHAETHON'—LORD GODERICH ON "THE DUTY OF THE AGE"— F. D. M. ON DEMOCRACY—A DIGGER	103-138

CHAPTER IV.

SEPTEMBER 1852—APRIL 1853.

HYPATIA AND AUGUSTINE—THE DANGER TO UNITARIANS OF A VIOLENT REACTION—THE SABBATH QUESTION AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE—THE ATHANASIAN CREED—THE 'PROPHETS AND KINGS' —LETTER INDICATING INTENTION TO GIVE SOON A FULLER EXPRESSION TO HIS THOUGHTS—PRESENT VIEW OF 'SUBSCRIPTION NO BONDAGE'—MENTIONS TO HIS SISTER A FORTHCOMING BOOK ADDRESSED TO UNITARIANS—THE RECONSTITUTION OF THE FRIENDS OF CO-OPERATORS UNDER THE NEW ACT—HOSTILITY OF POPULAR AGITATORS—CONFLICTING VIEWS	139-162
--	---------

CHAPTER V.

APRIL 1853—NOVEMBER 1853.

PUBLICATION OF THE 'THEOLOGICAL ESSAYS'—CORRESPONDENCE WITH DR. JELF—ACTION OF KING'S COLLEGE COUNCIL—LONG CONTINUED 'RECORD' ATTACK, MIXING CO-OPERATION AND THEO- LOGY AS CONCURRENT OFFENCES—EXPULSION FROM KING'S COLLEGE	163-209
---	---------

CHAPTER VI.

NOVEMBER 1853—BEGINNING OF 1855.

PUBLIC OPINION DECLARES ITSELF AGAINST ITS WORSHIPPERS— F. D. M. RESIGNS HIS POSITION AT QUEEN'S COLLEGE, AND OFFERS TO RESIGN LINCOLN'S INN—CAUSES LEADING TO THE FOUNDING OF THE WORKING-MEN'S COLLEGE—DR. CANDLISH'S ATTACK—SERMONS ON SACRIFICE—LONG LETTER ON THE OC- CUPATIONS OF THE FUTURE STATE—VIEW OF RELATION OF BUNSEN'S LINE OF THOUGHT TO HIS OWN	210-254
--	---------

CONTENTS.

v

CHAPTER VII.

JANUARY 1855—JUNE 1856.

PAGE

DEATH OF ARCHDEACON HARE—THE CRIMEAN WAR—WORKING-WOMEN'S CLASSES—LONG CORRESPONDENCE WITH MR. KINGSLEY ON DOUBTS OF VARIOUS KINDS—FOREIGN TOUR—THE SUNDAY QUESTION	255-283
--	---------

CHAPTER VIII.

GENERAL, AND FROM JUNE 1856—AUGUST 1857.

HOME LIFE—PERSONAL CHARACTERISTICS, ETC.—MOVES TO RUSSELL SQUARE—RETURNS TO QUEEN'S COLLEGE	284-307
---	---------

CHAPTER IX.

SEPTEMBER 1857—SEPTEMBER 1858.

LECTURES ON THE EPISTLES OF ST. JOHN—LETTER TO MR. LANGLEY GIVING AN ACCOUNT OF THESE AND OF A LONG CORRESPONDENCE WITH MR. MANSEL—INDIAN MUTINIES—DIFFICULTIES AS TO SUNDAY AT WORKING-MEN'S COLLEGE—ANONYMOUS WRITING AND SIGNED ARTICLES—"I".	308-326
--	---------

CHAPTER X.

1858 AND 1859, AND BEGINNING OF 1860.

THE BATTLE WITH ORTHODOX AGNOSTICISM—MR. MANSEL'S BAMPTON LECTURES, 1858—"WHAT IS REVELATION?"—"MR. MANSEL'S EXAMINATION OF MR. MAURICE'S STRICTURES"—"SEQUEL TO WHAT IS REVELATION?"	327-355
---	---------

CHAPTER XI.

APRIL 1860—OCTOBER 1861.

LORD EBURY'S SCHEME FOR THE REVISION OF THE PRAYER-BOOK—"THE LITURGY AND THE DISSENTERS"—APPOINTMENT TO ST. PETER'S, VERE STREET—FURIOUS ATTACK ON HIM—APOLOGIA PRO VITÂ SUÂ IN LETTER TO A FRIEND—A STRANGER'S PROTEST AGAINST MISSTATEMENTS ABOUT HIM—COUNTER MOVE-
---	--

	PAGE
MENT AROUSED BY THE ATTACK—FINAL BLOW TO THE TYRANNY OF THE ‘RECORD’—‘ESSAYS AND REVIEWS’—THE PANIC— ‘TRACTS FOR PRIESTS AND PEOPLE’—WOLFF’S TRAVELS .	356-397

CHAPTER XII.

OCTOBER 1861—AUGUST 1862.

DR. LUSHINGTON’S JUDGMENT ON HEATH—THE REFUSAL TO PAY MR. JOWETT HIS SALARY—VALUE OF THE ARTICLES AS PLEDGES OF LIBERTY—CONTINUATION OF ‘TRACTS FOR PRIESTS AND PEOPLE’—THE INSPIRATION OF ST. PAUL—PUBLICATION OF LAST PART OF ‘MORAL AND METAPHYSICAL PHILOSOPHY’—THE PER- SONALITY OF THE DEVIL—MRS. OLIPHANT’S ‘LIFE OF EDWARD IRVING’—CARLYLE AND IRVING—AN IMPORTANT PIECE OF AUTOBIOGRAPHY IN CONNECTION WITH IRVING—ON LEGENDS —TWO LETTERS ON THE ATHANASIAN CREED—ON THE CALLINGS OF MEN.	398-420
--	---------

CHAPTER XIII.

AUGUST 1862—JUNE 1863.

DR. COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH—MY FATHER’S EMBARRASSMENT —INTENSE DESIRE TO OPPOSE THE BISHOP’S VIEW—GREAT UN- WILLINGNESS TO GO WITH A MULTITUDE AGAINST HIM—WISHES TO RESIGN LIVING AT VERE STREET IN ORDER MORE STRONGLY TO ASSERT HIS ATTACHMENT TO THE ENGLISH CHURCH—CHANGE OF PURPOSE AND ITS MOTIVES	421-455
--	---------

CHAPTER XIV.

JUNE 1863—JUNE 1864.

THE MEETINGS OF CLERGY AND LAITY AT MR. KEMPE’S RECTORY— M. RENAN’S ‘VIE DE JÉSUS’—THE DECISION OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL ON DR. LUSHINGTON’S JUDGMENT ON THE WORD “ETERNAL,” AND ON VERBAL INSPIRATION—THE GREAT ALLI- ANCE OF DR. PUSEY AND THE ‘RECORD’—MY FATHER’S PRO- TEST—‘THE WORSHIP OF DIFFERENT GODS’—CORRESPONDENCE ON THE WORD “ETERNAL”—LETTER TO A MAN TROUBLED WITH DOUBTS—ON GOD AS THE REDEEMER OF THE WILL—OBJECTS TO REMOVAL OF ATHANASIAN CREED	456-484
---	---------

CHAPTER XV.

SEPTEMBER 1864—OCTOBER 1865.

PAGE

THE COLENSO QUESTION IN THE LAW COURTS AND IN SOUTH AFRICA—LETTER OF ADVICE FOR SOUTH AFRICA—LETTER TO STANLEY ON SUBSCRIPTION, EXPLAINING NATURE OF HIS OWN CHANGE OF VIEW—‘THE NAME IN BAPTISM’—‘THE DIVINE CHARITY’ IN LETTERS TO MR. KINGSLEY—LINCOLN’S ASSASSINATION AND ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF A THEOCRACY—THE DIVINE WORD—MR. HUGHES AS MEMBER FOR LAMBETH—ART AND SCIENCE IN RELATION TO ROMANISM AND PROTESTANTISM—EXPLAINS TO MR. KINGSLEY THE HISTORY OF HIS VIEWS ABOUT SUBSCRIPTION	485-507
---	---------

CHAPTER XVI.

NOVEMBER 1865—SEPTEMBER 1866.

PUBLICATION OF ‘ROBERTSON’S LIFE AND LETTERS’—LETTER ON EVIDENCES—PEARSON ON THE CREED—CORNEWALL LEWIS AS CRITIC—BUTLER’S ‘ANALOGY’—‘ECCE HOMO’—MR. KING’S PROPOSAL TO EXPOSE THE ‘RECORD’ WRITERS—WHY F. D. M. STOPPED IT—DR. PUSEY’S ‘EIRENICON’—DR. NEWMAN’S LETTER IN REPLY—DEAN STANLEY ON BOTH—THE ‘HEALING OF THE WOUNDS OF THE DAUGHTER OF MY PEOPLE’—WISHES BISHOP EWING TO EDIT A SERIES OF ‘CONFESSIONS’—VISIT TO OXFORD AND THOUGHTS THERE—ON ETERNAL LIFE AND ON THE POSSIBILITY OF SORROW IN HEAVEN—THE COMMANDMENTS	508-525
--	---------

CHAPTER XVII.

A CHAPTER WITHOUT DATE, BEING A GATHERING OF FALLACIES	526-541
--	---------

CHAPTER XVIII.

SEPTEMBER 1866—OCTOBER 1867.

ELECTION TO KNIGHTSBRIDGE PROFESSORSHIP, CAMBRIDGE—ON MAZINI—F. D. M.’S REVIEW OF THE WORK DONE SIXTEEN YEARS BEFORE—MEETING AT WORKING-MEN’S COLLEGE—INAUGURAL LECTURE IN SENATE HOUSE—HABITS AND PERSONAL APPEARANCE AT THIS TIME—DEMOCRACY—ON THE POSSIBILITY OF
---	--

SORROW IN HEAVEN AND ON ST. PAUL'S ACCOUNT OF THE RESURRECTION—ON THE REPULSION PRODUCED ON DISSENTERS BY THE ATHANASIAN CREED	542-564
--	---------

CHAPTER XIX.

OCTOBER 1867-SEPTEMBER 1868.

THE PAN-ANGLICAN CONFERENCE—CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE BISHOP OF ARGYLL—THE PRAYER-BOOK—THE CATHOLIC FAITH—FAITH—THE TRUSTER—DIFFERENCE AND INDIFFERENCE—LECTURES ON NATIONAL MORALITY—RELATION OF THE CONSCIENCE TO REVELATION AND TO MAN—THE “I” V. PSYCHOLOGY—TO THE FATHER OF A YOUNG MAN ABOUT TO JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME	565-583
---	---------

CHAPTER XX.

SEPTEMBER 1868-MARCH 1870.

LETTERS TO THE ‘DAILY NEWS’ ON CHURCH AND STATE—VIEW OF THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN THEM—SPIRIT AND LAW—LIFE IN DEATH—ON GUIZOT’S ‘LIVES OF LOUIS IX. AND CALVIN’—DEFINITIONS OF A SACRAMENT DESTRUCTIVE OF ITS ESSENCE—THE ASCENSION AS THE DESTRUCTION OF PRIESTCRAFT—ON THE DANGER OF COMPETITIVE EXAMINATIONS—RESIGNS, FROM ILL-HEALTH, ST. PETER’S, VERE STREET—THE GATHERING TO THE FINAL COMMUNION—USE OF “REVELATION” IN THE NEW TESTAMENT—FEMALE SUFFRAGE—DEAN STANLEY, F. D. M., AND THE BROAD CHURCHMEN—AN ARTICLE BY MR. LESLIE STEPHEN BRINGS THE RELATIONS OF THESE TO AN ISSUE—F. D. M.’S RELATION TO SCIENCE AND SCIENTIFIC AGNOSTICISM	584-609
---	---------

CHAPTER XXI.

MARCH 1870-JULY 1871.

THE EDUCATION QUESTION—MEETING AT EXETER HALL ON THE EDUCATION QUESTION—JOHN STUART MILL—THE CATECHISM—SYMPATHY WITH MR. FORSTER’S EDUCATION BILL—PROSECUTION OF MR. BENNETT—FEELINGS ABOUT THE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR—LETTER ON KNOWLEDGE BY THE DEPARTED OF THE DOINGS AND THOUGHTS OF THOSE WHO REMAIN—THE ATTITUDE OF
--	--

CONTENTS.

ix

	PAGE
THE RITUALISTS TOWARDS THE COMMISSION ON RITUAL—LIFE AT CAMBRIDGE DURING LATER YEARS—ACCEPTS THE CURE OF ST. EDWARD'S, CAMBRIDGE—THE SUNNY AUTUMN OF LIFE.	610-634

CHAPTER XXII.

MARCH-APRIL 1, 1872.

THE LAST HOURS	635-643
--------------------------	---------

“I cannot praise a fugitive and cloister'd virtue, unexercis'd and unbreath'd, that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race, where that immortall garland is to be run for, notwithstanding dust and heat.”—Milton's Areopagitica.

ERRATA.

VOL. II.

Page 6, line 8 from bottom. For "Communism, both" read "Communism both,"

Page 10, line 11 from top. For "none which" read "none, which "

Page 51. For "O. Brien" read "O'Brien."

Page 51 and page 54 in several places. For "Nicholay" read "Nicolay "

Page 62, last line of quotation from Miss Fox. For "thank worthy" read "thank-worthy "

Page 93. In address of letter. For "December 51, 1851" read "December 30th, 1851."

Page 124, line 3 from top. For "coincides with his, I think" read "coincides with his. I think "

Page 137, line 18 from top. For "harmony the only secret" read "harmony, the only secret "

Page 145, line 10 from top. For "mercy, yet" read "mercy. Yet "

Page 167, line 2 from bottom. For "don't, though" read "don't. Though "

Page 167, last line. For "rise again. I also" read "rise again, I also "

Page 171, line 16 from bottom. For "the grips of" read "the grip of "

Page 355, page heading. For "Mouth" read "Month."

Page 399, lines 5, and 6 from bottom. For "of the reformers of the Creeds, and of" read "of the reformers, of the Creeds and of "

Page 416, page heading. For "F. M. 65" read "F. M. 56."

Page 462, page heading. For "F. M. 57" read "F. M. 58."

Page 492, line 18 from top. For "consciences of members" read "consciences of numbers "

Page 499, first line of letter to Mr. John Hodgkin. For "11,00" read "11,000 "

Page 506, page heading. For "F. M. 59" read "F. M. 60."

Page 529. For "Mr. Rigga, a" read "Mr. Rigg, a "

Page 559. For "The Doctrines of Sacrifice" read "The Doctrine of Sacrifice "

Page 582, page heading. For "F. M. 62" read "F. M. 63."

Page 641, line 16 from bottom. For "the Father the Son, and the" read "the Father, the Son, and the "

I wish to draw attention here to what I have said, in the first few pages of this volume, as to certain characteristics of my father's letters, which make it very unfair to draw inferences from his letters as to the exact nature of those to which they are answers. Further it must be noticed that it often happens that the selection of a particular letter, as in itself the most valuable for the purposes of my father's life, leaves an unfair impression of his relations, on the whole, with the correspondent to whom it has been addressed. As an instance I may cite the case of the two letters on pp. 471-477, to Mr. Lyttelton. No one will be surprised at the selection of those letters; but, as they are of a somewhat controversial nature, they, if taken as representative of my father's relation to Mr. Lyttelton, with whom he was always on the most friendly of terms, will not convey a true picture.

The frontispiece to Volume II. is an engraving by F. Holl, after a portrait by Lowes Dickinson.

LIFE

OF

FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE.

CHAPTER I.

“The Times are great; what time is not?”—Spanish Gypsy.

1849, LATTER HALF—REMEMBRANCES OF F. D. M. AT THIS TIME BY PROFESSOR BRENTANO AND OTHERS—THE MEETINGS WITH WORKING MEN RESUMED—TENDENCY TOWARDS CO-OPERATION—LETTER FROM STUDENT ON NEWSPAPER ATTACKS—MAYHEW’S LETTERS ON “LONDON LABOUR AND THE LONDON POOR”—LETTER TO MR. HORT ON QUESTION OF FUTURE PUNISHMENT—PERIOD OF HESITATION BEFORE COMMITTING HIMSELF TO ACTION—BEGINNING OF THE CO-OPERATIVE MOVEMENT—THE NAME CHRISTIAN SOCIALIST—PRACTICAL DIFFICULTIES AND ACTION ON THEM—EXPLANATION OF OBJECTS AND VIEWS OF CHRISTIAN SOCIALISTS.

THE time had come, in my father’s life, when it was certain that a movement of which he would be the leader must begin. Friends were gathered round him. They and he believed that the times were out of joint, and were anxiously watching for some mode by which, within their own sphere, they might help to put them right. They had come into actual contact with the working men; they were hearing the men’s own difficulties and their own proposals. It remained as yet unsettled in what way the friends could offer their best help, but the body of professional men—lawyers, doctors, clergymen and others—were resolved not to disperse without offering their services to any cause which, after careful examination, might seem to deserve support.

At such a moment, just before the movement begins, it is well to give a sketch of the leader as he appeared to a distinguished foreigner who was about this time visiting England. On the whole, I believe, it will be better to describe my father's home life and habits after the story of his life has been followed through the storm, into which he was now about to plunge, and into somewhat calmer waters.

Herr Brentano, the present Professor of Political Economy at Strasburg, has recently thus recorded his own and Mr. Hüber's remembrance of my father.

After speaking of the dangerous severance of classes which had at this time shown itself in England, and tracing with great skill the causes of this national weakness, he goes on.

‘In this condition of things arose Frederick Denison Maurice.

B. A. Hüber has described him as “a man, whom very few of his contemporaries and countrymen equalled in inward piety, genuine patriotism, intellectual gifts, and in a cultivation, many sided, free, and altogether thorough; whom not many of them equalled in disposition, character, and life, and especially in that true sweetness of character which was the result of the proportion and harmony of so many gifts and efforts.” I can thoroughly confirm this statement from my personal knowledge. The characteristic of the man which left the deepest impression on me was a striking union of severe earnestness of purpose with irresistible kindliness. These two qualities were at once the cause and the effect of the complete drenching of his whole being in Christianity. It is necessary to explain quite clearly what this implies.

‘Nothing is more common than to meet people who emphatically describe themselves as Christians, and talk about Christianity. Nothing is more rare than men who in all their decisions and acts are naturally guided by the Christian spirit.

‘People believe in Christianity in general; but in each separate case they believe in self, with all its interests, inclinations, prejudices, and whims. Maurice was not merely guided in his general views of the world by Christian doctrines; it was impossible for him to think of any aspect of nature or of social life otherwise than from the Christian point of view, nor could he enter into any relation with men in which that Christianity which had transfused itself into his flesh and blood, did not find expression in the simplicity and gentleness which combined with his earnestness to form that loving sympathy which was so free from any trace of arrogance or self-seeking. 'Such a man was evidently marked out by his whole nature to exercise the influence of an apostle.' *

The influence which he exercised was certainly in no way due to oratory. Of oratory as a faculty of persuading men, he had the most profound dread, partly due to his thinking that it had been a bane and injury to Sterling. It was characteristic of him to say of one for whom he had respect as a statesman, "but I fear he is too much of an orator to be good for him as a man." But though he neither had nor cultivated any of the ordinary arts of speaking, there were times when the intensity of his feeling, the outpouring of his spirit under conditions which powerfully wrought upon him, produced an impression on an audience that hardly any oratory could have done. "I never heard such eloquence," is an expression used of him on many occasions by various letter-writers. "He left us all trembling with emotion," writes Miss Fox of a lecture at Queen's College. It was, however, always the eloquence of the intense expression of a great spirit rather than that of carefully chosen words. It came forth like a delivered message. It was no attempt to play upon the passions or to wield the wills of any present audience. His whole power as a chairman or president lay in his faculty of bringing out the best that had been said by each, and giving some harmony to the most discordant elements; never in leading some popular cry and giving it language. The most perfect expression, given to the feeling he produced, came off-hand one day, in a street in

* I quote from an unpublished translation, by my brother, of Herr Brentano's most interesting history (just published) of the Co-operative Movement in England.

Cambridge, from Dr. Thompson the present Master of Trinity. Meeting Canon Norris, who had just returned from hearing a University sermon by my father and was speaking of it, "Yes!" said Dr. Thompson "there is about that man θεῖον τι πάθος." The words would not be so expressive as they are if their full force could be given in a translation. They convey the sense of a man speaking forth under the influence of a divine possession.

His letters present a peculiarity very characteristic of him. I must warn all who read them from drawing too exact inferences as to the nature of the letters to which they are answers. The very same quality of sympathy which made men value him as a leader in the peculiar sense I have just spoken of, gave also a peculiar quality to his answers to letters. He always cared for the man who was writing to him, not for the particular questions put to him. He was in no wise ready or willing to supply answers that would save his correspondent from seeking for truth as it might present itself to the correspondent himself.

He writes always in eager sympathy with his friend in the difficulties he believes to be troubling the man himself. Often he does not exactly understand precisely what these are. As a rule he carefully avoids a specific answer to the specific question put to him. He does this deliberately and on principle; dreading lest he should thereby substitute himself as leader and answerer for Him to whom he believed that it was his duty to turn the eyes of all men. Most of those to whom he wrote have been anxious to own the help which he thus gave them. Here is a representative sentence, written from a layman to a brother, about some words of my father's, the like of which lies in many forms before me. "Giving you no definite directions what to do or how to act—suggesting no cry—with no taking points for use in smashing Romanists, High Churchmen, or Evangelicals, and yet somehow giving you far more knowledge of the whole thing than any one else has or can do." But those who came to him or wrote to him, not wanting this at all, not wanting to clear their own road to truth, but wanting to find some solution which would enable them to repeat the old religious formulæ, to them unreal, and in some kind of way to reconcile the philosophy which was for them real with these shadows—these men sooner or later gave him up with disgust, and with a disgust that was passionate and unreasoning in proportion to the disappointment they had experienced. From them, even more than from the religious formulæ-mongers, came those direct misstatements of what he said and of his line of thought, which made so much of the surrounding atmosphere of foggy misconception through which, from the time in which he began to be a conspicuous figure in London and in England, it was his fate to move.

It will be convenient, before returning to the thread of the history of the movement, to illustrate, by a specific instance, the tendency, which my father's letters sometimes have, to leave a false impression of the nature of the letters to which they are answers. On page 517, Vol. I., there is a letter to Mr. Kingsley on Mr. Froude's 'Nemesis of Faith,' in which occurs this passage, "I know what you mean about the passages which tormented and upset you. Do not suppose that I do not expect them to have that effect and that I did not feel them myself." From which it might seem that Mr. Kingsley had acknowledged that the book had troubled his own faith. That was not the case. He had spoken only of the effect he feared it would have on others. There are letters in this volume written to Mr. Kingsley to meet difficulties of his own, of the kind recorded in the 'Letters and Memories,' but in this sense the 'Nemesis of Faith' never troubled him at all. This is only one illustration out of many that I might give. I believe that this fact will be found to give to the letters both a peculiarity and a value of their own. They are letters written to actual men often in actual trouble, and though they do not deal always accurately with the detail of the matter now long since become quite unimportant, they meet the case on human grounds of general human interest.

To return to the history of the movement which was now about to begin.

As the conferences with the working-men proceeded at the Cranbourne Tavern the subject of co-operation was more and more forced upon the attention of those who there met the working-men. It is by no means easy now to realise the aspect under which co-operation presented itself in 1849. It was completely identified in the minds of the workmen themselves with anti-Christian views. To the general public in England all proposals for co-operation came branded with the stigma of anti-Christian Revolutionary Communism. But as the discussions went on it became more and more clear to the clergymen and laymen who took part in them that ideas had been connected together which were in reality not allied but opposed to one another. More and more clearly they began to see that it was impossible to resist the truth of much that was said by the working-men, although it was confused with much that was false. At first an effort was made to regulate the subjects of discussion; but the question of forming co-operative societies for workmen forced itself upon them, more especially at a conference which took place shortly before my father left London in the summer.

To Mr. Ludlow.

‘Bradley, Newton Abbot, August 13, 1849.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘. . . . I am now fixed here and cannot leave for the present. Pray tell our friends how very much it has grieved me to break my engagement with them, and how many points I would have strained to keep it. Pray take the chair yourself, and speak for yourself and from yourself your thoughts about Home Colonisation and Communism, both which will be worth many bushels of mine. I cannot blame the speakers for leaving the original subject. I think Kingsley’s denunciation (right or wrong) of pauper proprietors forced the question of Communism upon us, and I fancy that if one started from any point of Cooper’s we should inevitably in this day be brought to that topic. There was the most remarkable, and it seems to me instructive and edifying:

inconsistency in the speakers. I never heard a stronger witness for the power of the will to regulate and command circumstances than came from those Socialist worshippers of circumstances. I think they should be made to feel that Communism, in whatever sense it is a principle of the New Moral World, is a most important principle of the old world, and that every monastic institution—properly so called—was a Communist institution to all intents and purposes. The idea of Christian Communism has been a most vigorous and generative one in all ages, and must be destined to a full development in ours.

‘P. S. I have called on the writer in the Record (through Mr. Bickersteth) to come forward and accuse me to the Archbishop of Canterbury as visitor of King’s College. I hope that will bring things to a crisis.’

He went up, however, and did preside at this meeting. But he was unable to attend the next meeting on August 28th, as he was in the house of his wife’s mother who was dying.

To Mr. Ludlow.

‘Bradley, Newton Abbot, August 25, 1849.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘I should have liked very much to be with you on the 28th. It is the eve of my birthday. I have been about 44 years in the world and I feel that I have done almost nothing of the work that I was sent into it to do. The strong sense of a vocation—I may say, for you will not misunderstand me and set down the words to mere vanity—of a vocation to be a Church Reformer has struggled in my own mind with great natural indolence and despondency, and in my social intercourse with the incapacity of joining those who seek Reformation, but who give a meaning to the word which seems to me frivolous and false. I cannot enter into a party for the sake of compassing an end which involves the destruction of party. I have therefore been more delighted than most other persons would have been at the opportunity of meeting earnest people as friends and not as allies who must assuredly be agents, perhaps the main agents, in bringing about whatever changes, good or evil, take place during the next ten years. I am most thankful to be able to connect Church Reformation with social Reformation—to have all one's thoughts tested by their application to actual work and by their power of meeting the wants of suffering, discontented, resolute men. Whatever will not stand that trial is not good for much. I am sure that all which is of God in my desires and methods will; that what is my own will be exposed and cast out as it ought to be.

‘I should wish to have told poor Hetherington, who asked me in so touching a manner to use my influence with the Government on behalf of their plans, that if I wrote to Sir George Grey as he did, I should be sure of meeting with the same treatment, and with much better excuse; I do not see why a busy secretary of state may not throw the suggestions of a theorist like me into the fire, though he is bound to heed the cries of one who tells what he has suffered, and what he fancies would be a means of redress. But though I have not the slightest direct power of acting on the minds of statesmen, I do not think myself the least absolved from the duty of helping all I can to give the Communist principle a fair trial. On the contrary, I am convinced that the obligations of clergymen in this respect are stronger and their opportunities greater than those of Sir George Grey and Lord John Russell. The State, I think, cannot be Communist; never will be; never ought to be. It is by nature and law Conservative of individual rights, individual possessions. To uphold them it may be compelled (it must be) to recognise another principle than that of individual rights and property; but only by accident; only by going out of its own sphere, as it so rightly did in the case of the factory children. But the Church, I hold, is Communist in principle; Conservative of property and individual rights only by accident; bound to recognise them, but not as its own special work; not as the chief object of human society or existence. The union of Church and State, of bodies existing for opposite ends, each necessary to the other, is, it seems to me, precisely that which should accomplish the fusion of the principles of Communism and of property. A Church without a State must proclaim Proudhon's doctrine if it is consistent with itself; a State without a Church is merely supported by Jew brokers and must ultimately become only a stock exchange. Those who on High Church, Low Church or Dissenting grounds cry out for the abolition of this union are working unconsciously towards one or other of these ends, or rather towards the most tremendous struggle of two opposing, and, in their separation, equally destructive and godless principles. What I say is: To accomplish the best objects of those who desire this dissolution—to remove the fearful mischief which they rightly see follows from our present condition—we want the Church fully to understand her own foundation, fully to work out the Communism which is implied in her existence. She has been for a long while looking upon herself merely as a witness for the principle of property, merely as a second State instituted to embody and protect it. So far as her outward position is concerned this ignominious theory has involved all the degradation and state-subserviency of which, on different grounds, Mr. Denison and Baptist Noel complain. But it has led to worse inward consequences of which they do not complain, but which they both in their different ways have been promoting; to a low view. I mean of spiritual blessings, to a habit of regarding them as the property of an exclusive body or of the individual elect; not as treasures like the light and air of which all may partake together: hence to a misunderstanding, contraction, or underrealising of the truths of God's Absolute, Fatherly Love, of the Incarnation, of the Sacrifice for all, which are the great elements of Christianity as the Revelation to mankind and the universe.

Church Reformation therefore, in its highest sense, I conceive involves theologically the reassertion of these truths in their fullness apart from their Calvinistical and Tractarian limitations or dilutions ; socially the assertion on the ground of these truths of an actual living community under Christ in which no man has a right to call anything that he has his own but in which there is spiritual fellowship and practical co-operation ; nationally the assertion of a union, grounded not on alliances and compromises but on the constitution of things, between this Universal Community and the State of which the principle is Personal Distinction and the symbol Property. For this I desire to labour in all ways, being most careful to choose none by self will or from mere calculations of expediency, and to avoid none which God points out, because it may seem dangerous to oneself or to mere formal onlookers. I believe whoever enters on this path must lay his account with opposition, active or passive, from all quarters, must eagerly welcome and set down for gain all tokens of sympathy ; must have no confidence in himself ; must cultivate entire confidence in God and in the certainty of His purposes. It will and must be a long battle, in which many, even standard bearers, will fall. But the issue is not to be doubted ; let us work and trust for it.

‘P. S. Brewer (63 Queen’s Road, Bayswater), who takes the liveliest interest in our meetings, would I am sure preside, or would only be deterred by an unreasonable modesty from doing so, at the next meeting, if you think it important to have a clergyman. Mr. Elliott would also do exceedingly well, or Hughes’s friend at Paddington.’

Ultimately “Hughes’s friend”—Mr. Septimus Hansard—took the chair, and a very curious scene ended the meeting. The National Anthem was started as a finale. A number of the still rampant revolutionary chartists began to hiss. Mr. Thom. Hughes sprang on to a chair, and in a voice that all could hear, announced that the first man who hissed the Queen’s name would have personally to settle accounts with him. As Mr. Hughes’s fist was well known as one not to be despised, this gave a moment’s pause. Mr. Hansard desired the pianist to strike up loudly ; and any further attempts at hissing only added force to the tumult of enthusiastic singing with which the words were given forth by the loyal members of the meeting.

From an old Pupil of F. D. M., to one of the Professors of King's College.

‘ REVEREND AND DEAR SIR,

‘ September 10, 1849.

‘ After much deliberation, I have resolved to write to you on a subject which, for many months, has caused very great pain to many of my fellow-students and myself; but one, which—while we were strictly speaking “in statu pupillari”—it would not have been becoming in us to have asked your kind advice upon. But now I can preserve silence no longer, and the article in last Monday evening’s Record has made me so indignant, that I have resolved to trouble you with this letter.

‘ I can sincerely assure you, that, while Mr. Maurice was being abused in that wicked and shameless way, in which the English Review on the one side, and the Record with its friends, the Morning Herald and the Standard, on the other, strove to outvie each other, many of us were so enraged that we really burned to be able ourselves to do something to stem the torrent of falsehood and malignity; but you will readily see that then our hands were tied. I write to ask you, are they thus tied now? It is useless to correspond with the Record’s editor, for, without committing the slightest breach of charity, I must be allowed to declare that he seems, poor unhappy man, to labour to mis-state facts, and tell falsehoods, and to link men and their teaching together—to whom I fear, in his very heart, he knows he is doing an injustice. Were any of us to write to him there is no trusting him to insert our letter fairly—so this plan I have never seriously contemplated adopting.

‘ The plain state of the case seems to be this. Ought hundreds, (can I not say thousands?) of Christian families who think so highly of the Record, really to be under the delusion that Mr. Maurice has been teaching us Infidelity, Pantheism, Sabellianism, Universalism, and the like?—all of which he has been again and again, and week after week, accused of. I have myself read the articles wherein his teaching has been so wilfully and wickedly perverted. It is not right, it must not be, that these well-meaning people should be thus deceived. Forgive me, my dear sir, for writing thus strongly. I am simply giving utterance to what has for months been rankling within me—and you know how we all love and reverence our dear professor.

‘What I have to propose for your kind consideration is this: would it be of any avail for a considerable number of us students to state plainly and shortly how indignant we have felt while Mr. Maurice has been thus maligned; what were also the general characteristics of his teaching, and how he strove in all his lectures to stir us up to love and revere that word of God—his belief in the inspiration of which the Record so unscrupulously charges him with denying. Things ought not to be allowed to remain as they are.

‘Allow me to state that the feelings which I have described as actuating so many of us, were all but unanimously expressed. Can we then in any way, either those who have left the college (consisting of those of us who are daily striving to teach others, while daily benefiting from Mr. Maurice’s own teaching, and those who are still preparing for the sacred ministry), or can we in a body, both old and present students—and with what delight would we do this!—come forward and state the simple truth, so that all candid people may rightfully judge on this painful and solemn subject? Our own theological department is now suffering, and will hereafter suffer, from these abominable attacks. I freely confess to you that I bless God daily that I went to King’s College: for I have learnt from all our professors lessons which have deeply sunk into my heart; and if, with all my manifold imperfections, God does call me into the ministry, I shall be, hour by hour, in my ministrations to others, but reflecting back the light, humanly speaking, which was so freely shed on us there.’

Mr. Ludlow paid a visit to Paris during the summer vacation and came back full of the "then really magnificent movement of the Associations Ouvrières which," as he says, "seemed to meet the very mischiefs we were anxious to grapple with."

Whilst the conferences were being carried on, a series of articles were begun by Mr. H. Mayhew in the Morning Chronicle on "London Labour and the London Poor." They presented a picture of misery and destitution; they showed an impotence on the part of the working classes, in many trades at least, to make fair terms for themselves, an utter failure of the principle of demand and supply to regulate with satisfactory results the relations of employer and employed, which startled those who knew most of the poor of London. Even in the statements put forward by the working-men themselves no such complete evidence had been given. The men for the most part knew very little of the circumstances of any trade but their own, and were able to give only their personal experiences.

Most of those who were working with my father were becoming under these various stimulants anxious for some vigorous action. My father was divided between many feelings: an extreme dread of becoming the leader of a party and of stepping beyond his proper sphere of work; a strong feeling of the gravity of the crisis and of the impossibility of its being met by politicians alone; a fear of adopting some course, that should not be the right one, from the mere notion that something must be done; a determination not to be deterred from adopting the best course from any fears of personal loss or of public opinion. The weekly meetings at his house continued throughout the autumn.

On September 25th one of the Morning Chronicle articles gave an account of the condition of Bermondsey so appalling that for the moment the energies of all were diverted into the direction of sanitary reform. Mr. Kingsley came up to their meetings and threw himself vigorously into the cause.

Whilst this subject was mainly occupying them it happened that the Regius Professorship of Divinity at Cambridge fell vacant. To this matter the next letter refers.

F. D. M. to Archdeacon Hare.

‘MY DEAR JULIUS,

‘ November 2, 1849.

‘ Many things besides the falling of the horses seem to point in the direction of the professorship—if you can but make up your mind to become a resident in Cambridge, which I think from what I hear will be necessary. It would be a great and noble sacrifice for a noble end, but one which I could not urge you to make, sure as I am that you will be rewarded if you do.

‘ Bunsen has just been here. I was out when he came; when I returned he said he must have some private conversation with me. It seems that he was with Prince Albert yesterday; the Prince had just received a letter from the Bishop of Oxford pressing Trench’s great merits and fitness for the professorship. He asked Bunsen’s opinion. He agreed in all that Wilberforce had said, but maintained that I was the fitter man. The Prince, according to his report, was much interested by his panegyric and begged to see my books or some of them. I told Bunsen at once of your intention to stand. He was of course exceedingly surprised and delighted. It had never entered into his head, he said, that you would give up Hurstmonceaux. I asked him if that was necessary. He said he thought it would be. At all events he will write at once to the Prince unsaying his recommendation of me and hinting that it is possible you may be induced to come forward. I told him that I was quite out of the question. I belong now to Oxford and am to preach there on Advent Sunday. Men at Cambridge would not think of me, nor should I wish them to do it. Some day or other I may set up for private tuition at the other school—I mean when I am driven from King’s College and suspended by the Bishop of London. I begged Bunsen to say, as he was well inclined to do, that if you did not stand no one could be so good as Trench. He feels with me the all-importance of keeping out M. The mischief he will do to those who receive and to those who reject his teaching is unspeakable. I hope, therefore, there will be no—even accidental—collision of interests. Nor do I fear it, for I am sure you and Trench will perfectly understand one another. I have not written to him. I am sure he will retire at once if you are announced.'

To Mr. F. J. A. Hort.

'21 Queen Square, Bloomsbury, Nov. 23, 1849.

'MY DEAR SIR,

'Perhaps I shall best show my interest in the subject which is occupying your mind, and my gratitude for your confidence, if I tell you something of the processes of thought through which I have myself passed, while endeavouring to arrive at the truth.

'I was brought up in the belief of universal restitution; I was taught that the idea of eternal punishment could not consist with the goodness and mercy of God. When I came to think and feel for myself, I began to suspect these determinations. It did not seem to me that the views I had learnt respecting sin accorded with my experience of it, or with the facts which I saw in the world. I had a certain revolting, partly of intellect and partly of conscience, against what struck me as a feeble notion of the Divine perfections, one which represented good nature as the highest of them. Nor could I acquiesce in the unfair distortions of the text of Scripture by which, as I thought, they justified their conclusions; for I had always learnt to reverence the Scriptures, not to set them aside. I did not see how αἰώνιος could mean one thing when it was joined with κόλασις, and another when it was joined with ζωή.

'I do not mean that these were very deep, vital convictions; they were honest opinions as far as they went, though mixed with much intellectual pride. I despised the Universalist and Unitarian as weak; I do not know that I found anything at all better.

'When I began in earnest to seek God for myself, the feeling that I needed a deliverer from an overwhelming weight of selfishness was the predominant one in my mind. Then I found it more and more impossible to trust in any Being who did not hate selfishness, and who did not desire to raise His creatures out of it. Such a Being was altogether different from the mere image of good nature I had seen among Universalists. He was also very different from the mere Sovereign whom I heard of amongst Calvinists, and who it seemed to me was worshipped by a great portion of the religious world. But I thought He was just that Being who was exhibited in the cross of Jesus Christ. If I might believe His words, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father;" if in His death the whole wisdom and power of God did shine forth, there was One to whom I might fly from the demon of self, there was One who could break his bonds asunder. This was and is the ground of my faith. The more I have thought and felt, the more has the Scripture met my thoughts and feelings, by exhibiting God to me in Christ, reconciling the world to Himself; the more have I been sure that I was meant to trust this Being absolutely, universally—that my sin was not trusting Him. The certainty of one absolute in goodness whom I could call Father, has more and more obliged me to believe in a Son, to believe Him, as the Church believes Him, to be consubstantial with the Father; the more have I recognised the impossibility of a perfect all-comprehending unity, or of any living fellowship between me and my fellow-men, or of any practical faith in myself unless I confessed a Spirit proceeding from the Father and the Son, distinct from them, perfectly one with them.

'I can say, I did not receive this of man, neither was I taught it. Every glimpse I have of it has come to me through great confusions and darkness. With it has come the belief that God has redeemed mankind, that He has chosen a family to be witnesses of that redemption, that we who are baptised into that family must claim for ourselves the title of sons of God, must witness to others that they have a claim to it as well as we.

'You may think I am going a long way round to get at your question; but I really know no other road. The starting- point of the Gospel, as I read it, is the absolute Love of God; the reward of the Gospel is the knowledge of that love. It is brought near to us by the Gospel, so the Apostles speak: the kingdom of God is revealed to men; they are declared to be inheritors of it. The condemnation is declared to be choosing darkness rather than light, "hating Christ and the Father." A rebel state of will, at war with God, is the highest, completest misery. So far I think all go, in words at least. All will admit that damnation is in some sense loss of God's presence, that the curse lies in the rejection of love, separation from love, abandonment to self. All admit that God has sent His Son to save us from this perdition; from every other as included in this or the consequent of it.

St. John repeating our Lord's most awful prayer takes me a step farther. "This," he says, "is eternal life, that they may know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." At first we shrink from the strict meaning of these words. We suppose they do not mean that eternal life is the knowledge of God, but only that those who obtain that knowledge or that life will retain it through eternity. But when I ask myself, "Do I then know what eternity is? Do I mean by eternity a certain very, very long time?" I am shocked and startled at once by my want of faith and want of reason. Our Lord has been training us by His beautiful, blessed teaching to see eternity as something altogether out of time, to connect it with Him who is, and was, and is to come. He has been teaching me that I have a spirit which cannot rest in time, which must strive after the living, the permanent, the eternal, after God Himself. He has been telling me that He has come to bring me into this state, that He is the way to it. How dare I then depart from His own definition? How dare I impute my own low meaning of "eternal" to Him, and read myself into His words, when He is raising me to another meaning infinitely more accordant with the witness of my conscience, not involving the contradictions which my own does?

‘Now, believing from my heart that the words in the twenty-fifth of St. Matthew are quite as much our Lord’s words as those in the seventeenth of St. John, I am bound by reverence to Him—and if not by that, even by ordinary philological honesty—to apply to the former the meaning which I have learnt from the latter, this being the strictest I can get. I am bound to apply that meaning to both cases in which the word is used, getting rid of the difference which our translators have (not honestly, or with great carelessness) introduced between “everlasting” and “eternal.” I am bound to believe that the eternal life into which the righteous go is that knowledge of God which is eternal life; I am bound to suppose that the eternal punishment into which those on the left hand go, is the loss of that eternal life—what is elsewhere called “eternal death.”

‘Now, if you ask me on the strength of this passage, or of any similar one, to dogmatise on the duration of future punishment, I feel obliged to say, “I cannot do so. I find here at least nothing on the subject. I cannot apply the idea of time to the word eternal.” I feel that I cannot; everybody feels it. What do the continual experiments to heap hundreds of thousands of years upon hundreds of thousands of years, and then the confession, “After all we are no nearer to eternity,” mean, if not this? Do they not show that we are not even on the way to the idea of eternity? Might we not just as well have stopped at the hundredth year or the first? But this trifling becomes very serious and shocking, if there is a great and awful idea of eternity which our Lord would teach us, which belongs to our own inmost selves, and which we are flying from by these efforts to get it into another region. For the idea of enjoying God or being without God, we unawares substitute that Mahometan felicity or Mahometan torment which you speak of, and the whole of Christianity becomes depraved in consequence.

‘And yet do I then dogmatise on the other side? Do I fall back on the theory of Universal Restitution, which in my early days I found so unsatisfactory? No; I find it cold and unsatisfactory still. I cannot speak of God punishing for a number of years, and then ceasing to punish, or of the wicked expiating their crimes by a certain amount of penalties. The idea of a rebel will is, to those who know in themselves what it is, far too awful for such arrangements as these. A man who feels what sin means, who feels it as the contradiction to God's nature, the perfectly holy, and blessed, and loving nature, cannot find any comfort in the thought of God leaving men alone, or hold out such a prospect as a comfort to his fellows. He feels that God is altogether Love, Light with no darkness at all. But then that which is without God, that which loves darkness, that which resists Love, must not it be miserable? And can it not fix itself in misery? Has it not a power of defying that which seeks to subdue it? I know in myself that it has. I know that we may struggle with the Light, that we may choose death. But I know also that Love does overcome this rebellion. I know that I am bound to believe that its power is greater than every other. I am sure that Christ's death proves that death, hell, hatred, are not so strong as their opposites. How can I reconcile these contradictory discoveries? I cannot reconcile them. I know no theory which can. But I can trust in Him who has reconciled the world to Himself. I can leave all in His hands. I dare not fix any limits to the power of His love. I cannot tell what are the limits to the power of a rebel will. I know that no man can be blessed, except his will is in accordance with God's will. I know it must be by an action on the will that love triumphs. Though I have no faith in man's theory of Universal Restitution, I am taught to expect "a restitution of all things, which God who cannot lie has promised since the world began." I am obliged to believe that we are living in a restored order; I am sure that restored order will be carried out by the full triumph of God's loving will. How that should take place while any rebellious will remains in His universe I cannot tell, though it is not for me to say that it is impossible; I do not want to say it, I wish to trust God absolutely, and not to trust in any conclusion of my own understanding at all.

‘My duty then I feel is this : 1. To assert that which I know, that which God has revealed, His absolute universal love in all possible ways, and without any limitation. 2. To tell myself and all men, that to know this love and to be moulded by it is the blessing we are to seek. 3. To say that this is eternal life. 4. To say that the want of it is death. 5. To say that if they believe in the Son of God they have eternal life. 6. To say that if they have not the Son of God they have not life. 7. Not to say who has the Son of God, because I do not know. 8. Not to say how long any one may remain in eternal death, because I do not know. 9. Not to say that all will necessarily be raised out of eternal death, because I do not know. 10. Not to judge any before the time, or to judge other men at all, because Christ has said, “Judge not that ye be not judged.” 11. Not to play with Scripture by quoting passages which have not the slightest connection with the subject, such as “Where the tree falleth it shall lie.” 12. Not to invent a scheme of purgatory and so take upon myself the office of the Divine Judge. 13. Not to deny God a right of using punishments at any time or anywhere for the reformation of His creatures. 14. Not to contradict Christ’s words, “These shall be beaten with few, these with many stripes,” for the sake of maintaining a theory of the equality of sins. 15. Not to think any punishment of God’s so great as His saying “Let them alone.”

‘These rules I have laid down for myself, and have tried to act upon, how imperfectly God knows. One remark I would wish to make further on this point. You speak of the Liturgy and Athanasian Creed as if they laid upon us some new burden. But they merely adopt the language of Scripture respecting eternal punishment. Whatever meaning you give it in the New Testament, that you must of course give it in our services. And I am very sure that in this case, as in others, they are instruments of deliverance from the corruption and materialism of the popular theology. They do lead us to feel practically that the knowledge of God is eternal life, and the loss of God is eternal death. If we use them faithfully, we shall be educated out of the carnal into the Christian idea of eternity. Do you not find that it is so with bed-ridden women and humble peasants? They know inwardly that Christ does not mean millions of billions of years of enjoyment by eternal life. They are not good at numeration. But they worship the Father of an infinite majesty, His honourable, true and only Son, and the Holy Ghost the Comforter. Thus they find His promise made good to them, and they are not afraid of His ever ceasing to make it good to them.

‘You think you do not find a distinct recognition of the devil’s personality in my books. I am sorry if it is so. I am afraid I have been corrupted by speaking to a polite congregation. I do agree with my dear friend Charles Kingsley, and admire him for the boldness with which he has said that the devil is shamming dead, but that he never was busier than now. I do not know what he is by theological arguments, but I know by what I feel. I am sure there is one near me accusing God and my brethren to me. He is not myself; I should go mad if I thought he was. He is near my neighbours; I am sure he is not identical with my neighbours. I must hate them if I believed he was. But oh! most of all, I am horrorstruck at the thought that we may confound him with God; the perfect darkness with the perfect light. I dare not deny that it is an evil will that tempts me; else I should begin to think evil is in God’s creation, and is not the revolt from God, resistance to Him. If he is an evil will, he must, I think, be a person. The Word upholds his existence, not his evil. That is in himself; that is the mysterious, awful possibility implied in his being a will. I need scarcely say that I do not mean by this acknowledgment of an evil spirit that I acknowledge a material devil. But does any one?

‘When I spoke in the first edition of my ‘Kingdom of Christ’

of satisfaction offered by Christ to the devil, I was quoting from Bishop Hooper, and I wished to startle the admirers of our Reformers with the thought how vast a difference there must be between a theology which described the devil as demanding a price of blood, and God as demanding it. I did, however, recognise a deep practical meaning in Hooper's statement. It seems to me that in sore conflicts with the tempter one may find great comfort in saying, "Thou hast no claim on me; thou hast been paid full measure, pressed down and running over." And if justice is done to the feeling which is implied in this language, I believe the mind is freer to receive the full idea of that satisfaction which the Son made to the Father, that perfect reflex of His own love which He presented to Him, when He gave up His soul and body to death; when He showed forth the fullness of the Divine love in human suffering. I cannot think there is any object so perfectly satisfying to Him who is absolutely and perfectly Love as this sacrifice. Though I see but a very little way into its meaning, I do feel that it is the atonement of God and man; and that to feed upon it must be the communion between God and man, the bond of fellowship between all creatures, the rest of each soul. In that sacrament, and in the acts of trust and charity which belong to it, we shall, I think, enter into the deepest sense of Christ's substitution—by which I mean His entire identification of Himself with our sufferings and sorrows; His intense feeling and endurance of our sins, as only One perfectly pure and loving could feel and endure them; His representation of us as the living, victorious Head of humanity at the right hand of His Father. There may be more, must be infinitely more, in it than I perceive; but this I am sure is there. If He has redeemed men from the devil and atoned them to God, He has done for us that which we need—that is eternal life—we may be content. And to return to the first subject, I believe that in prayers, sacraments, sorrows, works for our fellow-men, we shall see more than we can ask or think, more than all the theories in the world can enable us to ask or think, of that ransom made for all, to be testified in due time. . . .'

Cholera was raging throughout the country. Sanitary neglect had manifestly increased the severity of its ravages.

Most of those who were now working with him became anxious to set on foot a "health league." Mr. Kingsley had warmly approved. In order to realise the experience which prompted the next letter, which gives my father's reasons for resisting the scheme, it is necessary to recall the enthusiasm with which, in 1838, he had thrown himself into what was practically an education league, the resuscitated National Society. That experiment had, as it seemed to my father, culminated in the rowdy scenes which he has described in his letters to Miss Hare. It seemed to him, however, that, in that case, he had only seen from within the same evil against which he had been all his life fighting, in the various High Church and Low Church party unions—all started with many noble aspirations, but all condemned, as he believed, by the results to which they had led.

To Mr. Ludlow.

'MY DEAR FRIEND, '21 Queen's Square, Nov. 24, 1849.

'It was with much self suspicion and a grievous sense of inflicting pain upon you that I threw cold, or, what is worse perhaps, tepid water over your plan last Monday. I should have to go into a long personal history if I undertook to explain how the dread of societies, clubs, leagues, has grown up in me, how I have fought with it and often wished to overcome it, how it has returned again and again upon me with evidences which I cannot doubt, of being a Divine not a diabolical inspiration. Yet whenever a suggestion of the kind you have made comes to me, I have the strongest feeling that all my conclusions may be wrong, that I may be merely gratifying a do-nothing instinct which no one is more conscious of than I am, and which no one has yielded to more shamefully.

‘I feel the force of very much of what you say, especially of your remarks about the shilling subscription and the importance and the possibility of making the people feel that they are not done for, either in the matter of health or education, but are fellow-workers with the rich in procuring both. A member of the Bible Society, still more a Wesleyan Methodist, might tell you that your complaint did not affect them, that their penny a week subscriptions were an anticipation of your project. Still I believe that you have touched a sore place in the proceedings of the National Society especially, and that we should all earnestly consider the right remedy.

‘But the more I think of it the more it seems to me that this is only a symptom of the disease which lies deep in the vitals of all our societies, whether for religious or economical purposes. You have not understood my objection to them. If by the Church I meant the bishops plus a certain number of dignified and undignified clergymen and certain representatives of the laity, the National Society would answer well enough to my conception: I should say the Church had taken cognisance of the want of teaching in the country. But meaning by the Church a body sacramentally united to Christ, this combination of Right Reverends and Reverends meeting in the Sanctuary at Westminster to legislate for the people of England, is in my eyes a very secular body. When it was trying to work by means of the diocesan and parochial organisation of the country, I overlooked the radical vice of its own constitution and hoped that it would call into existence that which would supersede itself. That dream has faded away. The meetings for party agitation, the lists of subscriptions intended to excite competition and appealing to the lowest feelings, should have warned me of what has followed and of what is to follow. The National Society will either become a mere dead log or it will be inspired with a false demoniacal life by a set of Church clubs which I do believe will ten years hence have left the Jacobin Club and every other at an immeasurable distance behind them in the race of wickedness. I speak what I feel; would that I trembled ten thousand times more than I do at my own prophecy!

‘To all you say about the rapid success of the Anti-Corn Law League, I answer in the words of the Bhagavad-Gita: “Those who worship the Devatas obtain speedy answers to their prayers.” Cobden, Bright, Fox, are the very specimens of this kind of worshipper. They laid their sacrifices on the altars of the evil spirit called Public Opinion, and they have or have had their reward. I grant you that the living and true God worked His own ends by their means, but their idolatry has produced curses and I greatly fear will produce more.

‘But I am not going to evade your appeal to my conscience by these gloomy forebodings about the results of other people’s doings. If they are true they are calls to earnest exertion, not reasons for shrinking from it. I will tell you then at once what I should like to substitute for your League. That is too big language. I do not like using it; but if you take Christopher Sly from his ale-house, put robes upon him and address him as a king, you must reckon upon his giving himself airs and in due time learning to order you about in very regal style. It is your own doing, and you must take the consequence.

‘So far from thinking that men who are conscious of their obligations are to wait till certain authorities of the State or of the Church begin working for one object or another, I believe that there is a sphere within which we all are Church and State authorities and are bound to act as such. The duties of neighbourhood, I confess; and think that I ought to do far more than I have ever begun to do for Ormond Yard. If you will come to me, as many of you as please, at any time to think what may be done for that place as to health or teaching, I shall be most glad to see you. I speak in this cold way because my mind is just now possessed with another thought, to which I wish to draw your attention, even at the risk (though I do not think that will be the effect) of neglecting the other.

‘When you first spoke to me it was as the Chaplain of Lincoln’s Inn. You wished that I could do something there to unite such young men as would be disposed to join in working for the poor in that locality. Your (I scarcely have courage to say our) Ormond Yard meetings grew out of that suggestion. I think my discouragement or inactivity led you to change your original conception for another. My present proposition then is yours not mine, modified only by the circumstances which have occurred since and by an inward sense of the responsibilities of my position, which I owe under God chiefly to you. It seems to me more and more that my preaching once a week is a poor thing if it bear no fruit in action; that I may talk about the Church as a family for ever if I do not try to show that it can, ever under any circumstances, fulfil some of the obligations of one; that the Devil will not the least object to my saying that the Church has a bearing upon all common life, if I take no pains that my particular Church should bear upon it at all; that he will be very grateful to me for telling my flock on the thanksgiving day that we could all find duties if we looked for them, provided neither my flock nor I look out for any. Lincoln’s Inn is a very powerful body of cultivated men in the midst of as bad a neighbourhood for health and probably education as most in London. If a small body of us could unite to do something for that place our bond would be surely a quasi-sacramental one—a much better one than that of any club or league, even if it did put D.G. on its tickets. We might work in good fellowship with the clergy, Redwear and Auriol both worthy and useful men, of the surrounding districts; we might call in our brethren in the Lord, Walter Cooper,* Shorter† and others, to help us and to tell us what the people want; we might ally ourselves with the medical men of King’s College Hospital, health or the dwellings of the poor being one primary object; we might also have our inspectors of education; we might set on foot our ragged schools; we should have the aid of your ally, Self.* I should be bound by my office to take any position you like to assign me; though I should desire that my colleagues Anderson† and Hawkins, who I am sure would cordially favour such a movement and the latter of whom has a very desirable share of radicalism, might take their proper precedence of me and give such help as they can. It seems to me that such a movement as this, which as I said before is yours not mine (I will take the shame or honour of my "league" name, though I do not remember when I bestowed it, if you will father this enterprise), must spread by degrees into different circles; that the Templars may come to feel their obligations; King's College also; and that thus by degrees we shall have a living, primarily local, ultimately universal organisation which may not only do much more work, much more abiding work than a league, but may serve as a powerful counteraction to those godless, exclusive no-church Church unions that are springing up, and also which may supply the place of the Exeter Hall societies when they die of inanition, as in due time they must. I speak as a clergyman to you as a lawyer. May we not by God's blessing help to secure both our professions from perishing?

* Ex-Chartist tailor.

† Ex-Chartist watchmaker.

'P. S. A word about Kingsley—I did not dream that you were stimulating him to work in which he was not more than ready to engage; I am never afraid of your hurting him; but, thinking as I do that he is a Thalaba with a commission to slay magicians and put the Eblis band which possesses our land to rout, I am jealous of anything which is likely to turn him out of his predestined course and may make him waste the God-given strength. I am sure the dark spirit must be at work to divert so dangerous an enemy, and God keep us all from being agents of the Evil One in this or any of his devices.'

Sidney Herbert had been led by the revelations of the condition of the needlewomen made in "London Labour and the

* A Scripture-reader.

† The Preacher of Lincoln's Inn.

London Poor" to propose a scheme for their emigration. Mr. Mansfield, strongly possessed by the belief that co-operation and not emigration was the remedy for the evils exposed, wrote a letter to the Morning Chronicle declaring that adequately paid work ought to be found and could be found for the women in London. It was in reference to this letter that the next was written.

To Mr. Ludlow.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘December 6, 1849.

- ‘Mansfield is right in saying that Sidney Herbert’s scheme ought not to make us comfortable and leave us free to eat, drink and be merry. He is wrong in his assumption that these women must be better and happier on their own soil than in Australia, or that it is not a good and noble thing to help people who will work to begin the world in a clear open country if they like it, or that they will of necessity not like it, or that it is more right to send out lazy people who will not do any good than those who will do much. That, I hold to be an accursed doctrine, on which it will be a sin and shame to act. Colonisation is not transportation; it is a brave, hearty, Saxon, Christian work. To stir up women or men to engage in it is to stir them up to feel that they are women and men in the highest, truest sense of the words.
- ‘I do not like this endless protesting and treading upon other people’s toes. It is not acting, however it may seem to be acting. It is only swelling the confused noises of the world and hindering action, which, if not the best possible, is good for something. I can see a hundred blunders in every scheme that is proposed if I sit down to look for them, but is not that precisely the very thing we have been all doing and are to leave off doing? If we are to have more charity, in God’s name let us begin with showing a little of it towards one another and, bearing with the weakness of good suggestions, helping them forward and trying to make them better. I like Mansfield’s spirit exceedingly, and wish I had more of it; but let him not waste it in hysterical utterances about past wickedness, our own or other people's, but contribute his help to the solution of the problem, without despising any poor brother who may be tasking his faculties to the same purpose. I could go mad too; and these bewildering charges and counter-charges and protests and objections upset my head and heart more even than the evils which upon such terms can never be remedied. "Ten grains of calomel." "No, Bleed! Bleed!" "Fool! Mesmerism is the only thing." "How dare you say so?" "There is Hydropathy; there is Homœopathy." "Thank you, doctors, one and all. You may draw the curtain. The patient is gone." Poor England! its tongue is foul; its pulse fluttering; it is dying of inanition and repletion; and we are debating and protesting! Let us devise a Socialist home Colonisation as soon as you please; provided only we give it a ground to stand upon, the sooner the better. But in the meantime here is this emigration. The sea is not an evil element for English men or women. They do not think it so. You have no business to put it into their heads. You destroy a part of their life if you do. Therefore let us help Sidney Herbert and Lord Ashley, say I, and get them, if they will, to help us when we have anything to ask their help in.

' P.S. Written at night. Somewhat surly; but true on the whole, and confirmed by my morning's judgment. Friday.'

To Mr. Ludlow.

' MY DEAR FRIEND,

' December 1849.

' I am very thankful to you for reproving me. If I have been unjust to Mansfield, or have checked his ardour, or shown want of sympathy with him, I have done a great wrong for which I desire to repent. I am a cold-blooded animal, very incapable, I know, of entering into the enthusiasms of better men, and often likely to discourage them greatly. The consciousness of this often keeps me aloof from them, as I feel I am doing them harm. But I have sometimes thought that I might be of use in warning those for whom I feel a deep and strong interest, against a tendency which I feel in myself and which I have seen producing most melancholy effects. I mean a tendency to be quick-sighted in detecting all errors in the schemes of other men, and to set up their own in opposition to them. Oh ! the bitter scorn which I have seen Newmanites indulging at the schemes of Evangelicals, scorn in which I have been well inclined to join ; and now the frost which has come on themselves, their incapacity of all healthy action. I could get the good will of you all very soon by flattering that habit of mind, and I am often tempted to do it. But God will not let me : and therefore He will not let me ever be the leader or subleader of any school or party in this land. For the only condition of the existence of such a school or party is the denunciation and execration of every other. I find myself becoming more and more solitary. I see that I am wide as the poles from Hare about the baptismal question. He wishes to make every one comfortable in the Church ; and I want no one to be comfortable in it, so cross-grained am I. Yet I seek for unity in my own wild way. He will be here to-night if you can possibly come in to meet him. Tennyson may also perhaps be here.'

There does not appear to be anything in either of the two letters last given to imply that my father was unwilling to enter into any scheme for helping forward co-operation among the working-men. They appear to show that he was only anxious not to make co-operation an excuse for interfering with any work that might be done by others ; but Mr. Ludlow says :

"The way in which Mr. Maurice [in the last two letters] seemed to check our efforts in this new direction was a great disappointment to us. We had yielded as to the 'Health-league,' which would no doubt have transcended the powers of nobodies like ourselves, and which indeed only excited any very strong feeling amongst a few of us. But the sense that something must be done towards promoting associated labour was strong in almost every one of us who were then grouped round Mr. Maurice. It was admitted by all that the conferences held with the working-men had unmistakeably shown this subject to be one uppermost in their thoughts and desires. We could no longer remain content either with mere talk on the one hand, or with evening schooling and some individual visiting of the poor on the other."

"It was determined that I should ask a few friends to dinner one day to consider the subject of setting up some co-operative workshops."

"Having regard to his late expressions of opinion, it was decided not to ask Mr. Maurice, but simply to tell him what we proposed to do. To our surprise and delight he invited himself, and not only offered no opposition, but entered heartily into the plan."

"This dinner, which took place in December, is referred to in Hughes's 'Tract on Christian Socialism.'"

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'January 2, 1850.

'I cannot tell how I have been able to go on till the second day of the New Year without wishing you and your wife and your children all Christmas blessings and all good things in the next half century. But one gets into such a stupid, helpless way of neglecting one's best friends, even those with whom I exchanged such cordial greetings the beginning of last year, and from whom I have received so many benefits in the course of it. We both have good cause of thanksgiving for what has befallen us individually since we parted at Ilfracombe, and must take in a stock of heart for the national troubles that are coming, and that must surely reach us and affect us deeply. However, late or early, here I am wishing you God speed.

'I like your tract exceedingly.* So far as it is done it is as good as can be. One or two words may perhaps be spared which one would like for one's own sake, but which may damage the cause in some people's eyes, whom we would wish if possible to have with us. I like your method of dealing with the subject, because you do not commit yourself to any specific social plan or any approbation of the partnership scheme for its own sake. I do not see my way farther than this. Competition is put forth as the law of the universe. That is a lie. The time is come for us to declare that it is a lie by word and deed. I see no way but associating for work instead of for strikes. I do not say or think we feel that the relation of employer and employed is not a true relation. I do not determine that wages may not be a righteous mode of expressing that relation. But at present it is clear that this relation is destroyed, that the payment of wages is nothing but a deception. We may restore the whole state of things: we may bring in a new one. God will decide that. His voice has gone forth clearly bidding us come forward to fight against the present state of things; to call men to repentance first of all, but then also, as it seems to me, to give them an opportunity of showing their repentance and bringing forth fruits worthy of it. This is my notion of a Tailors' Association, which I see must lead to something serious and should not be undertaken except with great seriousness; which may or may not lead to any new arrangement about work and profit. Given a moral state, and it seems to me the Morning Chronicle revelations are rather in favour of the conclusion that the old position of master and labourer might be a healthy one. But it is no old position we are contending with, but an accursed new one, the product of a hateful, devilish theory which must be fought with to the death.

* 'Cheap Clothes and Nasty.'

‘By the bye the English Review contains an article on the ‘Saint’s Tragedy’ full of high praise both of your political economy and your poetry, though very rightly denouncing my vanity for putting myself forward to introduce you to the world, and very wisely advising you to have as little to do with me as possible. It seems a very good article, this part of it especially, which I am sure ought to determine us, when the play comes to a second edition, to strike my name out of it altogether. I have had the pleasure and honour, which was all I desired, of sharing any obloquy you might incur from Romanists and Puseyites; and now I feel I am only doing you a serious injury by letting it be supposed that your poetry, which is so free and hearty, has anything to do with a set of opinions. I shall always be glad to think I have even the least claim of sponsorship for such a title, but it can now answer for itself, and I have no business to be leading it in my strings. Love to my true godchild* and his sister, and also to your dear wife, from Mrs. Maurice and my children. Their message is too long for my paper, including kisses and New Year's blessings unspeakable.'

To Mr. Ludlow.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

'Saturday, January 5, 1850.

'I have been thinking about our series of tracts. It has struck me that this is a branch of the business which we must, for the present at least, take into our own hands. I do not mean that we should not ask help—all possible help from Walter Cooper, Le Chevalier and others, but that the tracts should not be discussed at our general Association meetings, but rather at our select Monday evening meetings. We can then give them a determinately Christian character—determined in the sense in which the 'Politics for the People' had that character, without in the least obliging ourselves to any exclusiveness in our fellowship with tailors and others. These are the two conditions I want to secure. 1st. Full power of expressing all we believe and of making that which we believe the foundation of our acts. 2nd. Full freedom to unite for practical purposes with all whom we may find it expedient to bring into our circle, viz. all men of honest purpose, whatever their intellectual confusions may be. If we have tracts to present at our meetings of tailors, I have no doubt of their being all the more acceptable for their Christian and Church tone, because it will be an agreeable surprise to our friends that we should bring that tone to bear upon their wants and upon the social doctrine. But if we became partners in authorship with them we should get into a great many unnecessary conflicts or at all events questions, which might embarrass all our proceedings. I do not think there will be any difficulty in this arrangement if it is well deliberated on before we meet on Tuesday.'

* Maurice Kingsley: "true" as compared with the 'Saint's Tragedy,' which he is disclaiming.

The next letter is one of great importance, because it shows the feeling which prompted the adoption of the name "Christian Socialist." It will probably seem to many now that when the object of the friends was simply to set up a number of working-men's co-operative associations, in order to enable the men to free themselves from their slavery to the cruel "Sweaters" system, it was a mistake to adopt a name like "Socialism," which conveyed a number of ideas with which my father had no sympathy; but the fact is that it was the very idea of co-operative societies—the very bodies which are now looked upon as so essentially conservative in their character—that offended society in 1850. As will be seen in the course of the narrative, there was no absurdity connected with equal wages, or the national workshops in Paris, or any of the extravagances of democratic socialism which were not assumed as necessarily involved in the mere fact of establishing these associations. Everything that was most distinctly repudiated by all the words and acts of my father and his friends was asserted to be the thing they were preaching and practising. There is not the smallest evidence that this was due to the adopted name. It was due to hostility to the very thing to which, under the patronage of the Queen and Prince in 1883, every newspaper writer in England is cap in hand.

To Mr. Ludlow.

'MY DEAR FRIEND, 'Hastings, Wednesday Evening, 1850.

'I see it clearly. We must not beat about the bush. What right have we to address the English people? We must have something special to tell them, or we ought not to speak. 'Tracts on Christian Socialism' is, it seems to me, the only title which will define our object, and will commit us at once to the conflict we must engage in sooner or later with the unsocial Christians and the unchristian Socialists. It is a great thing not to leave people to poke out our object and proclaim it with infinite triumph. "Why, you are Socialists in disguise." "In disguise;" not a bit of it. There it is staring you in the face upon the title page!" "You want to thrust in ever so much priestcraft under a good revolutionary name." "Well, did not we warn you of it? Did we not profess that our intended something was quite different from what your Owenish lecturers meant." This is the fair play which English people like, and which will save us from a number of long prefaces, paraphrases, apologetical statements which waste time when one wants to be getting to business.'

To Mr. Daniel Macmillan.

'MY DEAR MACMILLAN,

'February 7, 1850.

'I do not know whether I ever thanked you for sending me that kind Scotch review of my friends and me, which it was very soothing to all our vanities to read after the shocks they sometimes suffer on this side the Tweed. I do not know either if I told you how glad I should be of any introduction to any King's College youths from you or any of your friends. I fancy I omitted to tell you so, because it was the end of term when you wrote and I was not likely to benefit by your letters then. Now I should be exceedingly glad if you will tell me of any you would like me to know.

'Those Morning Chronicle letters have set us all grieving, thinking, and I hope in some measure acting. One association of tailors in which the working-men are to receive the profits has been started, I hope with a real prospect of co-operation and success; it begins operations on Monday in Castle Street, Oxford Street. We shall send you a list of prices; pray make it known in Cambridge, and say how much I feel interested in it to any who may take the least interest in me. I hope also that a Needlewomen's Association on the same principle, only with more superintendence from ladies, will be begun shortly. It is but a first start; perhaps we shall fail utterly; but the principle I think is sound, and will spread and bear fruit hereafter. Our great desire is to Christianise Socialism. We wish to begin working on a small scale, but also to explain what we mean by a series of tracts. I have written the first, which is a dialogue. The series we have called boldly 'Tracts on Christian Socialism.' 'Is there any chance of circulation? It is what we have talked of so often coming to some expression. Let me know what you think would be the best method of proceeding.'

'21, Queen's Square, February 28, 1850.

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'Has Ludlow told you of our Chartist poet * in Castle Street? He is not quite a Locke, but he has I think some real stuff in him. I hope he will not be spoiled. All our tailors seem to feel themselves so much better and freer men since they began to think better of the gentlefolk that I am afraid for their sakes more than for any one's else, lest we should be too ferocious. I know how hard it is to find the exact point where righteous wrath ends, and unrighteous bitterness begins, still more to know how much of the first it is wise, and therefore godly to pour out; but I am sure God can teach us the limit, and that He will not leave us to our own random conclusions and acts. I have caught myself tripping so often that I have become very self-distrustful and sometimes think that it is better to hold one's tongue and buy clothes.

'Our needlewomen have not struck at all, but are very thriving. We had a momentary hitch in the Committee. Now all is right and our Prime-Minister, who is a very capital one and exceedingly well able to manage a Cabinet, returns to office on her own terms. I have every certainty that we are on a right tack; of success I am hopeful. We have admitted nine women, who are all promising.'

* Gerald Massey.

To Mr. F. J. A. Hort.

(Who had consulted him as to a course of philosophical reading, and told him of that prescribed by Dr. Whewell.)

‘ March 5, 1850.

‘ . . . I do not pronounce whether that which Dr. Whewell has marked out for you is abstractedly the best or not. But the benefit of yielding up one’s own judgment in such a case, of not being compelled to make a line for oneself with the imminent risk of changing it twenty times a month, always getting a glimpse of a better which turns out to be a worse, is unspeakable. It is one of the acts of obedience which carries, I believe, the surest reward with it. Alas! I know it chiefly by the punishment of disobedience.

‘ But I am not at all sure that you could materially improve the list of books the Professor has given you. My own taste and feeling would have led me to omit Stewart. I am afraid I am not just to him; for he has admirers at whose feet I should be glad to sit. But he does, I confess, fill me with wind. I do not get strength and nourishment from him. Perhaps on that account I might be all the better for taking a dose of him occasionally; and you, if you agree with me in any measure, will not suffer from that which you find unpalatable.

‘ For this slight and moderate penance you have the richest compensation, as wholesome and strong diet as a man could desire. I am not acquainted with the ‘Charmides’; I doubt if I ever read it. But I never have taken up any dialogue of Plato without getting more from it than from any book not in the Bible. I do not think it signifies much where you begin. The attempts to systematise his writings seem to me in general unfortunate; his own beautiful and wonderful method is contained in each one, and any one thoroughly studied is the initiation to the rest. I would advise you to reject no helps. Cousin and Schleiermacher will both be very useful; but Plato is the commentator on Plato, and it is a great mistake, I am sure, to fancy that any one else can interpret him as well. I think too that our English judicial and dramatical habit of mind is more akin to his than either the French or the German, great as the skill of the former is in catching his points, and of the latter in tracing out the course of his thought. I should conceive an ordinary German would have failed utterly in translating him, from his confidence in his own knowledge of philosophical terminology and his passion for system. Schleiermacher is a happy exception in both respects, at least so it strikes me; he was content to be a learner and he sought for method, not system. Still I cannot think that he or any one of his countrymen could follow the windings of the dialogue with the thorough delight and sympathy which seem to me possible for a very third-rate English student. Plato's humour in Cousin's hand often becomes persiflage, yet on the whole the clearness of the French style, if it be shallow, seems to me to reflect the image better than the other. I am, however, no judge of this matter, and I rather speak in parable to tell you what I believe is true of the moral science itself. There is nothing I desire more than that we should be Englishmen and not either Scotchmen, Frenchmen, or Germans in our studies of whatever kind they be. For this reason, if for no other, I should adhere to my principle of keeping metaphysics in entire subordination to ethics. We may, I think, be most successful ethical students in virtue of those practical habits which we always cast aside when we plunge after Frenchmen or Germans into metaphysical speculations. I do not admit for a moment, when I talk of plunging, that they must needs go deeper into spiritual questions than we do; I believe the deepest philosophy is that which lies under the business of life and explains it.

'I have always contended that Plato is quite as practical as Aristotle; nay, that if he is rightly studied as he would have us study him, in connection with the life and purposes of Socrates, he is more practical. But I am sure Aristotle has excellences of a very high kind which Plato has not, and I am very glad that Dr. Whewell has given him so conspicuous a place in his curriculum. I would advise you to study the 'Politics' as well as the Nichomachean Ethics; and not to forget the Rhetoric, though I should not be disposed to give it as much time as one might be tempted to do by its remarkable acuteness, vivacity, and variety. The 'Politics,' though it may be difficult always to trace the course of the thought, seems to me a book of the highest value; I am most thankful for what it taught me. It should be combined with the study of the Republic by any one who is meditating on ecclesiastical or civil polity. I think I learned to feel the preciousness of the Bible as a history and the absolute impossibility of a Church which had not a divine history for its basis—supposing it to have the finest philosophy in the world—very much through these books illustrated by the experience of my own life and of our own times.

'I am glad you are taught by the Professor to connect politics with ethics, and international law with national law, through Grotius or any other medium. I know scarcely anything of Grotius, but I dare to say he may serve better than a deeper philosopher for the purpose of suggesting questions which he is not likely to answer: on the whole I should hold fast to Plato and Aristotle, and make the other books of the course illustrative of them. Our modern Socialist questions which, as you say, must press more and more upon us will, I conceive, present themselves to you again and again while you are busy with these ancients. And it is a grand thing to read the newspapers by their light, and them by the light of the newspapers.

'I send you my tract in this letter. You shall have the second soon. I do not suppose they will be read much, but they may set some people thinking who will do something better themselves. I do not wish to represent it as any merit in the working-men to join a trading fraternity; but neither do I think it is any merit to join a purely religious or benevolent fraternity. It seems to me the right thing to do both one and the other kind of work according to the Gospel, and that is all I see about it.'

Walter Cooper, the ex-Chartist, a tailor who had paved the way for the conferences at the Cranbourn Tavern, had been naturally selected to organise the first association, that of the tailors. That was opened and began work before any other. But as fresh opportunities presented themselves and the working-men of different trades began to ask for help in setting up associations, it became necessary to give to the movement a more regular form. The friends organised a "Society for promoting Working-men's Associations," the principles and rules of which were set forth in one of the 'Tracts on Christian Socialism.' The friends themselves, with one or two of the working-men and others who were added from time to time, formed a "Council of Promoters" for this society. Virtually, therefore, at this time there were two sets which met weekly at my father's house on different days, viz. the old body of Lincoln's Inn men, who came now ostensibly only for the Bible class; and the more general "Council of Promoters," which met for business and included several besides those who came to the other meetings.

The heterogeneous character of the more private meeting has been already explained, and new elements made the "Council of Promoters" even more markedly diverse in its composition, and in the views and opinions of its members.

In order, however, to follow the letters which will be given, and to understand, so far as is necessary for the purposes of my father's life, the nature of the problems discussed in them, it will be convenient here to make clear three lines of thought which gradually came out more and more, and the relation of which to one another determined at least my father's action.

First of all there was the pure business side of the question. From time to time this assumed different degrees of importance, and different members took different views about it. From this point of view the main thing was to make the associations succeed, and to take such steps as would lead to this result.

Secondly, there was what may be called the Christian-Socialist view par excellence. Those who took this view desired to reconstitute society on the basis of co-operation as a great Christian and true social principle, and to banish out of society everything which opposed itself to these principles.

Thirdly, there was my father's point of view. He applied to the case before him precisely the same principles as had guided him in each successive stage of his manhood. He found it declared as a principle that selfishness was the basis of society and the law of the universe. He eagerly accepted "co-operation" as a practical protest against that assumption. But in his tract, in his many lectures, in all that he ever uttered on the question of co-operation as well as in the letters to be given, he maintained that all the great work that has been achieved by society in its existing form has been achieved by the mutual co-operation of men, and that it has been where selfishness has intruded itself that rottenness and mischief have followed in its train.

He dreaded the tendency to make "Christian Socialism," as such, an excuse for denouncing all who were not Christian Socialists, and equally the temptation for himself to leave his own proper business and become involved in matters which would altogether prevent him from asserting the principle he had at heart. Beyond all things he dreaded becoming the head of a party of Christian Socialists. His great wish was to Christianise Socialism, not to Christian-Socialise the universe. He believed that there were great truths involved in the principle of co-operation which were essentially Christian truths, and that as these had acquired a bad name because of the falsehoods that were mixed up with them, it was pre-eminently the business of a man who was set to preach truth to face the personal obloquy that would attend the task of separating the true from the false and defending the true.

The first question of practical business that presented itself for solution to the "Council of Promoters" forced my father to express some of these thoughts more strongly than before. The working managers of the associations considered it essential to have a central organisation which should form a bond between the individual associations, and serve as a check upon irregularities. Mr. Ludlow wrote to urge my father to become, with himself and others, a member of the "Central Board" to be thus formed. My father's reply was as follows:—

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘March 17, 1850.

- ‘I should have been as much affected by the arguments as I am by the tone of your letter, if I had not seen Sully and conversed with him on the subject of the central board this morning.
- ‘How much pain it caused me to feel that I was crossing a scheme of his, which was as dear to him as his life, and was incurring all the dislike and contempt from him and his friends which you say must be your portion if you follow me in my reactionary course, I will not say.
- ‘How much additional conviction I gained from his words that the line I have marked out for myself, for no one else, is the right one; that any other would involve me in a fatal desertion of the principles upon which I have for years striven to act, and above all of that principle of fellowship and brotherhood in work which I have felt called to assert with greater loudness of late, I will attempt to explain.
- ‘He said plainly—I appeal to Hughes and Campbell whether I am misrepresenting him,—that the associations were actuated by a thoroughly mercenary, selfish, competitive spirit; that they aimed merely at a more successful rivalry than is possible on the present system; that consequently they would, of course, produce results much worse than those which the present individual competition was producing unless they were directed by a central board which would organise them efficiently and scientifically, or at least set before them an efficient and scientific mode of organising themselves.
- ‘This is the doctrine of a man whom you believe and I believe to be one of the honestest and noblest specimens of the English Socialist school. Now, do I complain of him for believing in this power of organisation to make sets of men with an evil moral purpose good and useful? Certainly not.

It is part of the creed which has grown with his growth and strengthened with his strength. It must be the hardest thing in the world for him to throw it off. Nor do I believe that he does really hold these men in whom he takes so earnest an interest to be the mere devils he describes them as being! I believe no such thing. I am certain he knows that there are higher, truer impulses and desires with them, and that these are leading them to co-operation and brotherhood in spite of all the selfishness which is drawing them asunder. But the more I entertain this conviction the more solemnly am I bound not to confirm him in what I ever have held and do now hold to be a lie, the more am I bound to bear witness for that truth which is at work in his mind, and which must work itself out there if he is really to help his brethren out of bondage into freedom. If I join his central board, I say, he teaches me to say, "My purpose is to turn a number of warring forces, each seeking the other's destruction, into harmony, by certain scientific arrangements of mine concerning production and consumption." Now, what I have said, and so long as I have breath in my body hope to say, is this, "I acknowledge in these warring creatures an element of peace and harmony, the work of God's spirit. To that I speak in each of them. I can speak to nothing else. If the Son of peace be there my peace will rest upon them; if not, it will return to me again. I have no hope of entering into terms of peace with the devil. I have no notion that I can make him my servant by a mere ingenious and extensive combination. I believe the more skilful and large the combination of such elements, the worse and the more deadly will be the result."

Talk as much as you like about putting the hand to the plough and drawing back. I never did put my hand to this plough. I have put my hand to another from which I should draw back at once and for ever if I tolerated by any word or act the maxim which Sully distinctly avows and upon which he rests the necessity of a central board. Talk as you like about my system-phobia. It is this which I mean by system, it is this which I have hated in the Church, the State, the family, the heart, and which I see coming out more fearfully every day—the organisation of evil powers for the sake of producing good effects. Sully, who had to my surprise read some parts of my ‘Kingdom of Christ,’ saw and said at once, with his usual honesty, that I was consistent with myself and was acting on the maxims I had avowed there, though he seemed to have hoped that I had by this time seen their folly and futility. That I have not done. God’s order seems to me more than ever the antagonist of man’s systems; Christian Socialism is in my mind the assertion of God’s order. Every attempt, however small and feeble, to bring it forth I honour and desire to assist. Every attempt to hide it under a great machinery, call it Organisation of Labour, Central Board, or what you like, I must protest against as hindering the gradual development of what I regard as a divine purpose, as an attempt to create a new constitution of society, when what we want is that the old constitution should exhibit its true functions and energies.

‘For that distinction I exist only to testify. The sooner God pleases that I shall finish my testimony for it, and that some other and more faithful and more wise protestant shall appear, the less will be my sorrow. For having considered and tried to count the cost, I see this only before me, ever increasing misunderstanding, ever increasing incapacity of being a fellow-worker even while I desire to be that and nothing else. To guide and govern is not my business; I am ashamed to think that you should, any of you, allow the notion in your minds that it is. Sganarelle might be beaten into a doctor, but Christopher Sly could only be made a king when he was drunk. I am not quite drunk and I don’t want to be a king, though I am thankful to claim to be one of a family of kings and priests, and am bound to assert the authority of the true King by whom, and not by central boards, associations are prevented from breaking into atoms. And in His name, and in assertion of His rights, I will with God’s help continue to declare in your ears, and in the ears of the half-dozen who are awake on Sunday afternoons, that no Privy Councils, National Councils, or Œcumenical Councils ever did lay, or ever can lay, a foundation for men's souls and God's Church to rest upon. That is what I said in my sermon. I did affirm distinctly that Christ had used councils and might use them when and how He pleased, as He may, for aught I know, construct central boards for the management of trade fraternities. But I do say that neither the Council nor the Central Board can make the fraternity, or establish the law or principle of it, and that if we build churches upon the decrees of councils, or associations upon decrees of central boards, we build upon the sand, and that when the rain comes our houses will fall, and that great will be the fall of them.

‘What you say about the influence over the working-men, coming from you, if you formed part of a central board, is I am sure mere delusion. Sully has a strong will and has all the theory of organisation at his fingers' ends. He must guide and you follow, or if not, you must be continually making a vexatious and painful resistance to him upon points, maintaining a useless and expensive war of posts while the real difference of principle between you is kept out of sight.’

To Mr. Ludlow.

‘Ephraim Lodge, Mount Ephraim,

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘Tunbridge Wells, March 26, 1850.

‘I had a conversation with Le Chevalier before I left town which seemed to me to set the whole question between us in a much clearer light than I had before seen it. His great wish seems to be that the original promoters of the first Association should continue to act in the character which was at first assigned them and in no other, at least for the present. This position with whatever responsibilities it may involve, I think is a reasonable one and one to which we are already pledged, and so far as I am concerned I have not the least desire to shrink from it. I judge from a paper of Hughes which he has sent me this morning, that this is the hint upon which you are all at present disposed to act. I am very thankful if I am right in my conjecture.

‘I feel with you that we need light and that God is most willing to vouchsafe it if we seek it humbly. Passion week and Easter week have for me an indescribable stillness and awfulness, from all that they are in themselves and have been in my own history. Yet I have chiefly to confess my own utterly dull and hardhearted use of them, and to thank God for teaching me that I must depend wholly on Him, and not on them—a lesson slowly learnt, very imperfectly received, but worth all the suffering and humiliation by which it has been, in a measure, forced upon me. May God bless you abundantly in this time and all times, and make you a true associate of Christian brotherhood and fatherhood wherever you are.’

As a consequence, the “Central Board” was formed of the managers of the several associations, and dealt with pure questions of business detail, the “promoters” remained a generally superintending body, engaged in furnishing assistance and advice, in acting as referees and arbiters when called on, in defending and promulgating their principles, in gathering and disseminating information.

‘Ephraim Lodge, Mount Ephraim,

‘MY DEAR MRS. RICH,* ‘Tunbridge Wells, March 28, 1850.

‘I am very much obliged to you for letting me see the letter of your friend Mr. Schwabe. It expresses intelligently and benevolently the feelings and opinions of a large, respectable and powerful class of our countrymen, whose arguments and whose experience are entitled to great attention, even when they are presented in a much more dogmatical and intolerant form. He has, you will have perceived, entirely mistaken

* A French translation of this letter has already appeared in ‘Richard Cobden. Notes sur ses Voyages, Correspondances, et Souvenirs, recueillies par M^{me}. Salis-Schwabe,’ Paris 1879, p. 111, where will also be found the letter to which it is an answer, and a further letter addressed to Mrs. Rich in response to the letter of my father’s here given.

our plan, when he assumes that an association of workmen must pay all equally. There is no occasion to discuss his views of human nature or working nature as they bear upon that point, because with the exception (I believe, but am not sure) of Louis Blanc, I do not know that any supporter of co-operation urges or recommends that course.

‘Le Chevalier, who for twenty years has been mixed up with every Socialist thing, and has been more engaged in working them out than most, not only advocates the weekly payment of labourers according to the work they do, but thinks that the ultimate division of profits ought to follow the same rule.

‘Little as I know about the subject, I am quite inclined to agree with your correspondent, and to acknowledge the force of his argument against making the industrious pay for the idle. When he makes the valuable and important concession that competition may be excessive, it seems to me that he gives up the whole question. It is not then the law upon which trade or human life is to be regulated. Let it come in under whatever modifications he thinks reasonable, it must come in as a mere make-weight or additional stimulus to act upon men who are primarily moved by some quite different inspiration. If we can settle what that inspiration is, I have no fear that we shall allow competition more than its legitimate influence, or that it will claim it for itself. At present it boasts to be the one governing motive of human-beings. Reason declares, the most painful experience proves, that if it does govern it is destructive of Society—that it sets up every individual against his neighbour. The good master, by your correspondent’s showing, is the one who allows least influence to the principle of competition in determining his own acts towards the workmen, and the one who is most careful that he shall rule competition, making it, as he says, a competition for excellence instead of cheapness, and that competition shall not rule him. I accept the definition and fully believe that the more encouragement we give to the principle of association, the more of such masters we shall form. Your correspondent thinks so too, only he tacitly encourages the workmen to associate for strikes instead of for labour. I apprehend, speaking of course in profound ignorance and merely from common sense, that every successful strike tends to give the workmen a very undue and dangerous sense of their own power, and a very alarming contempt for their employer, and that every unsuccessful strike drives them to desperate and wild courses. In urging them to direct their passion for association, which can never cease among them, and is just now especially rampant, into a different channel, I think we are favouring the cause of order, diminishing the rage against capital and helping the manufacturers much more than they will help themselves if they merely raise a wild cry against Socialism.

“There is much no doubt, as a very distant and ultimate consideration, in what your correspondent says about the impossibility of large enterprises with present loss being risked by associations of mere workmen. We certainly shall not be able, if we wished it, to apply the principle except to those trades which do not require those long waitings for returns, or where these merely lead to extravagant and ruinous speculations. If a healthy tone is restored to those occupations by the unspeculative labourer taking the main interest in them, I must think that the benefit to morality will be very considerable. If great commercial enterprises require the co-operation and predominance of the capitalist, as I am not at all disposed to deny that they do, then the capitalist will find his proper field. He will be obliged, I believe, in due time to admit his workmen to a share of his profits, but I question exceedingly whether he will find those workmen at all disposed to controvert his judgment about the best way of realising ultimate advantages, if he gives them an adequate support commensurate to their services, such support of course to be deducted from their future gains. In the meantime, so far as I can observe, the workmen are most glad, only too glad, to defer to the experienced and intelligent capitalist, if they see that he has their interest at heart as well as his own.

‘The principle of association, I am convinced, has taken too strong a hold on the minds of the working classes for any power directly to fight against it. It may be worked well or ill, destructively or savingly. It seems to me that every man is bound to ask himself, every member of the middle or manufacturing class especially, What can we do to lessen the present evils?’

CHAPTER II.

“Look back along the great names of history ; there is none whose life has been other than this. They to whom it has been given to do the really highest work on this earth, whoever they are—Jew or Gentile, Pagan or Christian, warriors, legislators, philosophers, priests, poets, kings, slaves—one and all, their fate has been the same—the same bitter cup has been given them to drink.”—Froude’s England’s Forgotten Worthies.

1850 continued—1851, 1852—A GENERAL STORM OF OBLOQUY ASSAILS MY FATHER AND HIS FRIENDS—IN THE MIDST OF IT MR. SLANEY’S COMMITTEE REPORTS TO THE HOUSE OF COMMONS IN FAVOUR OF CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETIES—MR. HOLYOAKE LEADS THE ATTACK ON CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM AND IS FOLLOWED BY BOTH ‘QUARTERLIES’—THE COUNCIL OF KING’S COLLEGE, ETC.

MR. SCHWABE’S letter, to which that given at the end of the last chapter was an answer, marks the attitude assumed at this time towards the Christian Socialists by one large body of the political economists of the day. A letter given in the course of that chapter will have suggested that the religious newspapers and their followers in the daily press had not been slow to seize the moment, when the motives and views of my father and his friends were specially misunderstood, to begin a regular crusade against his theological views ; not that the writers were in the abstract anxious to oppose the efforts to do good, for the sake of which not a few of the Christian Socialists had sacrificed all personal prospects, had alienated many of their dearest friends, and had in some cases made even severer sacrifices than these ; but on the broad principle, which, with unbroken regularity, so far as I have come across it historically, marked the conduct of these self-styled “religious,”* anonymous writers, that the time when it is most righteous to denounce a man, from whom you differ in opinion, is the moment when you know that he has no chance of having a fair hearing, and when every misstatement that you make against him will be greedily swallowed.

At this particular moment it had become the correct thing to do to denounce every effort, no matter what, by which my father had endeavoured to do service.

The lectures which had been delivered by him and others at the opening of "Queen's College" in 1848 had been published in the course of 1849.

His contributions had consisted of,

(a) 'Queen's College, London, its Object and Method.'

(b) 'On Theology.'

(c) 'Address at the End of the First Term.'

With these had been published lectures by Messrs. Kingsley, Brasseur, Bernays, S. Clark, A. D. Strettell, C. G. Nicholay, O. Brien, Jackson, Hullah, W. Sterndale-Bennett. H. Warren, and T. G. Hall.

In the March, 1850, number of the 'Quarterly' (No. CLXXII.), a fierce denunciation of all these lecturers appeared. To this, in behalf of them all, my father replied in 'A Letter' to the Bishop of London, which was published in the spring of 1850. It would be useless to go into such a controversy now: but any one who cares for a specimen of the possible recklessness of a Quarterly Reviewer in levying charges against public men, may find it worth while to compare the article and the reply.

Whilst the newspapers were for the most part denouncing

* I use the term here, as elsewhere, of those journals only which are written on the assumption that they and their readers represent all that is good among men, and that the fact of differing from them is a sufficient excuse for bringing every kind of accusation against other men. There were other journals, which, whatever name they assumed, believed that the fact of their calling themselves "religious" did not absolve them from the ordinary rules of justice and of right. To these my father was often able to appeal; they, often more readily than others, did justice to his appeal to truth and right as larger than their shibboleths, vide p. 85, infra.

Christian Socialism, and all connected with it, a member of Parliament, Mr. Slaney, obtained a Committee to inquire into the "Investments for the savings of the middle and working classes."

As soon as the Committee began work they found that the witnesses from whom they could obtain most information were the barristers, who had been engaged in the conferences with the working-men and had been endeavouring to enable the latter to secure the fruits of their own industry.

Mr. Ludlow was the first witness examined; Mr. Hughes, Mr. Vansittart-Neale, and others of the "promoters," followed. This led to the examination before the Committee of Messrs. Millbank, one of the secretaries of the Association, Walter Cooper, James Clarkson, a baker, and others of the working-men concerned in the associations, so that the subject was thoroughly ventilated and brought under the cognisance of Parliament.

Finally John Stuart Mill was examined and gave some of the strongest evidence that was recorded as to the Conservative character of co-operative associations, e.g. : "I think there is no way in which the working-classes can make so beneficial a use of their savings, both to themselves and to society, as by the formation of associations to carry on the business with which they are acquainted, and in which they are themselves engaged as work-people, provided always that experience should show that these associations can keep together."

At this time the great practical difficulty in the way of working-men's associations was the fact that they could not form themselves without extravagant cost into legally corporate bodies. There was, therefore, nothing to prevent a dishonest member from cheating, or even ruining a society. On this rock many of the associations set up by Owen, and others, had split. No adequate security could be offered for borrowed capital. On being asked whether he would think it well that legislative facility should be offered to the men for associating, and "for preventing fraud among themselves, by summary jurisdiction before a magistrate," Mr. Mill answered : "I should think that hardly anything which the legislature can do in the present state of society, and the present state of the feelings of the working classes, would be more useful than that."

The report was printed on the 5th of July. But it in no way moderated the fierceness of the attacks by which the promoters were assailed, for the simple reason that it was not read by the reviewers. The 'Edinburgh,' which fully accepted John Stuart Mill as the great political economist of the day, published six months later an attack upon the attempt to give co-operation a fair trial, in an article which absolutely ignored the existence of the Blue Book which dealt with the subject.

In July my father went abroad and spent several weeks at Godesberg and Heidelberg with his family. He went with Mr. Trench on a trip to Baden Baden, Frankfort, Strasburg, visiting the Murgthal from Baden.

He was passing through the press his sermons, soon afterwards published, on 'The Church a Family,' and 'The Patriarchs and Lawgivers of the Old Testament,' and was, as in all vacations and spare moments, engaged on the 'Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy.'

He saw something of Dorner and other German thinkers, and was especially glad to hear what he could of the "Innere Mission," but no records of the visit of any interest remain.

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'October 20, 1850.

"I am satisfied that this is a time in which men of talent should be encouraged to take orders if they can do it honestly. I would have all laymen feel that they are called by God to their different offices, but I do not think they will feel it if we do not feel our call more distinctly, and assert it against all doubts in our own minds and apparent contradictions from without. We are called, and we may believe that we are; anything that the devil says to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding. If X. has not great moral objections, which he should never stifle, but which he should not either presume to be unsurmountable, I should say to him with all my heart, "Join us"—and especially would urge him to be your curate. Love to Mrs. Kingsley; I hope I may believe your report of yourself; but do not come on Wednesday.'

'Alton Locke' had been published in the spring of 1850. The Record led off the attack against it. In order to protect Queen's College from the imputation of being associated with its author, and partly frightened no doubt by the general attack on Queen's College made by the 'Quarterly,' Mr. Nicholay, one of the professors, wrote to the Record to explain that Mr. Kingsley no longer belonged to the college—the fact being that my father had only proposed Mr. Kingsley's joining them when he hoped that Mr. Kingsley would have been appointed as his assistant at King's College, and that Mr. Kingsley had found the strain and expense of coming up for the Queen's College lectures from Eversley too great to be borne for that object alone, and had accordingly resigned.

As soon as Mr. Nicholay's letter appeared, my father at once resigned his office as chairman of the committee which managed the affairs of the college. Hitherto no governing council had been created, but my father was anxious that one should be appointed. Subsequently a charter was obtained, which Mr. Ludlow drew up for them, and a council independent of the professors was appointed.

To Mrs. Maurice.

'MY DEAREST MOTHER,

'November 14, 1850.

'I think if I could explain the reasons of my conduct to you, as I hope to do when I see you, it would not seem to you that I acted merely upon a sudden impulse in resigning my office at Queen's College. It was quite necessary for me to take care that I was not committed to expressions of opinion respecting Kingsley and his book, which would have made the working-men consider all my language about them hollow and insincere, and that I should on the other hand not take advantage of the confidence which the supporters of Queen's College had gained from Nicholay's statement in the Record, when I did not concur in it.

'He has, however, made an explanation which I think satisfactory, and I have agreed to act as chairman of the committee, till the new council is appointed, it being understood that the office is vacant and that they have power to fill it up as they please. If they choose me I shall accept it, because they will do it with their eyes open. I have seen more reason since I have conversed with different members of the committee, and found how much their views and mine differ respecting the course which Kingsley and I are taking, to believe that some step of the kind was indispensable. But I am very anxious not to set up my own judgment against that of friends, and I hope I have now satisfied them that I had no wish to leave the college if I could do it any good by remaining.'

The necessity for some organ which should serve as a means of communication between those who in all parts of the kingdom were becoming interested in the subject of co-operation, was now generally felt among my father's friends. His own profound dislike to newspaper writing made him at first resist and afterwards reluctantly submit to the necessity. Mr. Ludlow agreed to become editor, and the Christian Socialist appeared for the first time on November the 2nd, 1850.

My father wrote very little for it. Some long letters on education in the form of a correspondence between himself and an M.P., and a tale, 'The Experiences of Thomas Bradfoot, Schoolmaster,' were his only considerable contributions. Occasionally he interfered on some issue which he regarded as a matter of principle. He was ordinarily in this and other matters so anxious that opinions widely differing from his own should not be checked by any expressions of his about them, that it not unfrequently happened that his friends fancied for some time they were carrying him along with them, and then when he was called on for his personal sanction, suddenly found themselves brought face to face with a decisive objection on his part. In each of these cases his decision was finally accepted. There were at this time monthly "conferences," between the promoters and working-men "associates," at which all points connected with the movement were discussed.

To Archdeacon Hare.

‘MY DEAR JULIUS,

‘December 5, 1850.

‘. . . . We had a conference which would have interested you very much. The people told us very frankly their suspicions of us, and proclaimed their democratical dislike of our managers. But they called out a strong counter feeling, which showed how much they are learning by association.’

In the beginning of January 1851 Mr. Hughes, Mr. Lees, and my father went on a tour throughout Lancashire, beginning at Manchester on January 1st, to gather and spread information in relation to working-men’s co-operative societies. Walter Cooper had made a similar tour in September 1850, and a second in December. The idea was being taken up and associations formed in many towns throughout the country. My father delivered lectures in various places—London, Southampton, etc.—in defence of the cause.

Various questions in connection with the several associations were being continually referred to him. Correspondence with all parts of the country was continually increasing. As each association was set up in London its circumstances had to be discussed by the Council of Promoters. It was his special business to prevent the very great divergence of view which often existed among them from rendering all common work impossible, and to endeavour to carry out on this small scale the principle which he had been advocating at each crisis in the history of the Church, that of giving to each active idea full play, and of resisting the “negative” efforts to crush it.

Mr. Kingsley was beginning his study of the Alexandrian schools with a view to the production of ‘Hypatia,’ and consulted him as to the books to be read.*

‘MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

‘January 15, 1851.

‘To understand the Platonists of the fourth century I conceive you should read the Enneads of Plotinus, who belongs to the third. He is, I apprehend, immeasurably the greatest and the lawgiver of the rest. The life of Apollonius of Tyana by Philostratus will give you a notion of their efforts to combine miracle-working and a semi-divine person with philosophy. You should also read Clemens to see the working of the tendency in its highest Christian form, and you must go back to Philo to see its earlier Jewish starting-point. The Christian Alexandrian school is worthy to be thoroughly restudied, I should think: its influence on Athanasius and the Arian controversy was very great indeed. By all means read the noble little book of Athanasius against the Gentiles if you have it; it is full of deep wisdom. . . .

* The letter is that to which the one in Mr. Kingsley’s ‘Life,’ vol. i. p. 264, smaller edition, is an answer.

‘P.S. Holyoake has declared war: the ‘Eclectic’ on behalf of the Dissenters is inclined to be hostile (though polite to ‘Alton Locke’); the ‘Edinburgh’ will no doubt be a broadside. You young men must fight, if it is necessary. Consule Planco, I might have borne arms, but not now.’

The close personal acquaintance, which my father and his friends had now begun to form, with the more thoughtful spirits among the working-men of London, and the freedom with which they had succeeded in inducing the men to speak their thoughts to them, led to the discovery of a feeling about the God whom they supposed to be the object of Christian worship, which was one simply of bitter hostility and repugnance. Scoldings had only driven them away, and at the easy platitudes of many of the clergy they had simply laughed. Mr. Kingsley undertook to tackle the actual points which were raised by the ‘Reasoner,’ the anti-Christian publication of which Mr. Holyoake was the editor. He wrote a series of articles in the ‘Christian Socialist,’ under the title “God justified to the People,” and while preparing the third, which was on the massacres of the Canaanite nations by the Jews, he wrote to ask my father for his thoughts on the subject, subsequently sending him the letter which he intended to publish. To this my father’s next letter refers.

‘MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

‘January 30, 1851.

‘I shall not fulfil my promise of saying anything to you about the Canaanites, because you have told me more than I ever knew, and have cleared up the whole subject to me marvelously. I approve of your letter, and I think Ludlow will: you have managed it so skilfully and in a way so much to conciliate his prejudices. The only thing I should wish you to bring out more distinctly in these letters (it does not apply more to this one than to any other of the series), is that God, according to the scripture view of His character and dealings, cannot make men right by any exercise of omnipotence. Of course, everything you are writing presumes this; but it must be repeated in plain words again and again: people do so cleave to the notion of naked power being able to act upon wills, and it is such a justification of God to the people that He educates the will and does not crush it. I think I first saw light about the Canaanites in this way. My dear brother-in-law, John Sterling, had convinced me most clearly that Alexander, instead of deserving to be denounced, was doing a mighty work in bringing Greek civilisation to bear upon Asia; yet he was utterly horrified at the Jewish wars. I asked myself why? what was the end of each? and if it was an end for humanity, and a higher end than the other, was it wrong to say God was the author of it? Could it be any one else? But this you have worked out more clearly than I did then, or have done since. You see the Chronicle made one or two alterations in your letter to show that they and we are not in the same boat.’

‘MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

‘February 6, 1851.

‘I duly forwarded each chapter of ‘Yeast’ to Parker the day I received it. I cannot easily tell you how deeply they have interested me. I should not have had the courage to write them if I had had the power, but I dare not alter anything or recommend the suppression of anything. I hope and believe they will not merely reveal the thoughts of many hearts, but carry healing to them. The last chapter touches fibres which will quiver in every one, but they must be touched, and you have done it with real gentleness and wisdom. God bless you.'

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'February 25, 1851.

'I am sure that you are right, Wordsworth's Prelude seems to me the dying utterance of the half century we have just passed through, the expression—the English expression at least—of all that self-building process in which, according to their different schemes and principles, Byron, Goethe, Wordsworth, the Evangelicals (Protestant and Romanist), were all engaged, which their novels, poems, experiences, prayers, were setting forth, in which God, under whatever name, or in whatever aspect, He presented Himself to them, was still the agent only in fitting them to be world-wise, men of genius, artists, saints. For us there must be something else intended—either the mere science millennium of Comte, from which good Lord deliver us, or the knowledge and life of God as the ground of all human and earthly knowledge and life. You have a right then to wind up the biography of a sporting man with the Trinity better than Berkeley has his tar-water treatise. Let no one rob you of the right.'

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'March 23, 1851.

'Be quite sure that you must not, cannot, and shall not leave the Council of Promoters. The notion of our being injured by association with you, or not expecting to be pelted by High Churchmen, Low Churchmen and no Churchmen! If you go on that ground I must leave all the societies I have anything to do with. The truth is, I am afraid 'Yeast' is going to be rather too popular and respectable. After your civil speeches to the Guardian I should not wonder if they discovered it to be, what it is, a specially orthodox book. After all, our greatest enemies will be of the Newman* and Greg school.

* i.e. F. W. Newman (not J. H.). Mr. Greg was the writer of the 'Edinburgh Review' attack.

‘Talking of that, I mean to write to Greg and claim all the merit of your letter about veracity and gentlemanly feeling. I have done so to H. Merivale, who is angry at the allusion to him. It is rather too bad that, when you are so courteous and well-bred in your own newspaper outcomings, you should be pelted for adopting my ferocities. I shall tell Mr. Greg that I hold myself fully entitled to impeach the veracity of any anonymous critic who says that black is white, though the moment he drops his mask and becomes an ordinary flesh-and-blood Englishman, I instantly acknowledge his claim to the plea of “invincible ignorance,” and every other for that case made and provided—which is no fiction, for I do respect Greg the manufacturer, though not the reviewer.’

The following was written on the last sheet of an article by Mr. Ludlow, which was therefore suppressed.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘April, 1851.

‘No! No! No! Don’t insert this for the world. It is wrong in all ways. Wrong because it shows a sensitiveness to opinion which we ought to keep down in our hearts, wrong because it really perverts the meaning of the Times and appropriates words to ourselves which may not have been intended for us, wrong, above all, because it brings us into connection with that Chartist-Socialist movement with which Thornton Hunt wishes to connect us and from which, for the sake of truth, we must be as free as possible. I do not rejoice in that attempt to unite Socialism with Chartism. I believe it is a silly sham. You will repent deeply of the letter, if it goes in, for many a long day.’

To Mr. F. J. A. Hort.

‘May 1851.

“ . . . In 1838, when T. Acland told me of the plan which he and his friends had formed, of restoring the educational efficiency of the parochial and diocesan system of the Church through the National Society, I asked him whether anything could be done through that effete body. He said he thought much might be done with it. I admired the effort though no one could help seeing how it was marred by vulgar political agitation, which they I believe in their hearts disliked, but which was set on foot to galvanise the central body. They kept it to its work till 1842. Then it made a convulsive struggle for schoolrooms by pleading that they were meaning to put down Chartism. What could be a more fatal sign of want of faith in education itself than this eagerness to draw arguments for it from the selfishness of the higher classes?

‘ . . . Three years ago I was induced, by a very ingenious and able speech of the Bishop of Oxford, to think that it might be useful in securing better terms for the schools, and in saving the conductors of them from a sacrifice of independence. But the more I have reflected on the subject since, the less have I been able to maintain that opinion.’

Also to Mr. F. J. A. Hort.

‘ June 1851.

‘ . . . Our parishes we believe indicate the idea of co-operation between the clergyman and every class of those committed to him. It is for him as God’s servant and soldier to work out the idea, believing that no management clauses will be the least obstruction to him, if he knows how to use spiritual power with his people; and that no Denisonian Chartism about the rights of the clergy will help him the least, if he has faith in a system instead of faith in God. The management clauses put the clergy upon their mettle: they try whether the real moral power of rule is in them. But they do not really do this as much as the old system—which people pretend to worship, without understanding it—did. The clergyman, I suppose, has a legal supremacy in vestries; why in the name of wonder do so few exercise it? The truth is, no legislation can make a man, or endow him with the faculties of a man.’

On June 11, 1851, Miss Caroline Fox was present at one of the Associates’ Tea Meetings at St. Martin’s Hall, and thus records in her Journal the impression it made on her:—"Our chairman, F. D. Maurice, is at his post behind the urn, but he springs up to welcome his friends. He seemed nervous, for there was no arranged plan of the evening. In listening to the workmen's speeches, especially Walter Cooper's (cousin to the author of the 'Purgatory of Suicides'), we could not help feeling very thankful that such fiery spirits had been brought under such high and holy influences, leading them to apprehend self-sacrifice as the vital principle on which all successful co-operation must be founded. One hopeful feature in this associative experiment is that they are prepared and expect to make mistakes in application, but the principles of sympathy and self-sacrifice they hold by for ever. Archdeacon Hare was delighted at the spirit and genius of some of the speakers; there was so much of calm practical wisdom, so much of applied Christianity, humbly acknowledging its origin, as made it altogether a deeply interesting and thank worthy occasion."—Journal of Caroline Fox, ii., 170.

To Mr. Ludlow.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

'June, 1851.

'Mr. James Marshall has written me two notes to urge that I would, if possible, persuade you to join Kingsley and me at dinner at their house next Saturday (I suppose seven, but I will ascertain exactly). It is strictly for Socialist purposes. They have 2000 men in their employ and really want to talk with us about them.'

The dinner was "for Socialist purposes" in a sense of which my father was not aware when he wrote. A number of the political economists of pure blood, who were at that time the fiercest in opposition to co-operation, had been invited to meet the defenders of it, and a battle royal had been designed by the hosts. But as Mr. Ludlow describes the dinner: "James Marshall was a very shy man and never dared enter on the subject, no more did any one else, each standing on the defensive. So that from first to last the conversation was of the most general description, one of the oddest incidents in it being, that Mr. Maurice set both the M.P.'s right on some point of parliamentary practice. Had Mrs. Marshall been present, things would have no doubt turned out quite differently."

In July he went down with his youngest son (seven years old) to visit his sister Priscilla, then very ill, at Hastings.

To his Wife.

'Hastings, July 9, 1851.

'E——— has been on the beach with me the last two hours, and very good. He says he likes the sea much more than he did; he used to care only about the ships and reading the names on them; I think he was conscious of a new kind of feeling at sight of the waves.

'This day twenty years ago, about the time I am writing, my sister Emma died. I believe she has been with me often when I did not know it; and that we are really surrounded by all that we have lost. I do not think we bring them to us by our thoughts and recollections, but that they are present with us, and that we should believe it more if we believed that God was with us.'

To Mr. Ludlow.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

'Hastings, July 11, 1851.

'I have just been writing to Hullah upon a subject in which I think we also ought to take an interest, and which may ultimately, if not immediately, help us in our special objects. Old Barber Beaumont, it seems, shortly before his death, established an institution at Stepney which was to promote the civilisation of working-men in that neighbourhood and in London generally. A house was built containing a room capable of holding 1200 people, a concert-room with an organ in addition, and some apartments for a curator. His directions were so indefinite that the present Mr. Beaumont applied to the Court of Chancery for a plan. It was decided that the whole fell to him by the statute of mortmain. But he is very desirous of doing justice to his father's intentions.

- They have been prevented during the progress of the suit (he being very busy in his own fire-office work at the other end of the town), the room being used partly for dancing, partly for some infidel lectures, partly for anti-Papal meetings, &c.
- ‘ There is about £300 a year for the support of the institution, which may be increased by contributions, if a reasonable and extensive scheme can be suggested. Mr. Beaumont, who seems to be a very worthy man, has applied to a clergyman who is staying here to give him a plan, and he has asked my help in concocting one.
- ‘ The nature of the building made me think at once of Hullah as a man who could do most and least violently to turn it from a mere place of popular amusement into one of valuable instruction. But along with this there may be much else done, either in the way of lectures or classes, which must be brought directly home to the working-men’s feelings and interests. The population, you know, consists to a great extent of sailors. Will you send me suggestions? Would Mansfield give a chemical, Walsh a sanitary, Penrose an architectural lecture? and could we make out something of a programme of lectures for the year; not all of promoters, but with a proper mixture?
- ‘ The clergyman I have spoken of is from Northampton. He is much interested in the Socialist movement. I hope we may get through him at the Northampton shoemakers and the Lancaster stockingers. He speaks of the immense loss the Church has suffered in Anderdon and Bathurst, who would have thrown themselves into this or any great Christian movement for labourers, but have now thrown themselves into Romanism. The other clergy about him he has not much hope of.
- ‘ There is a young man named Dimsdale, a barrister, living in Half Moon Street, with great desire to be useful and means of being so, very shy, who, I am told, has written a review of ‘ Alton Locke ’ for the ‘ Westminster ’ and goes out seeking for knowledge about the working-men. I shall call upon him when I come to London. Can any of you make him out ? ’

Lectures were as a consequence of this proposal delivered by several of the promoters.

In July an attempt was made, chiefly by Mr. Ludlow, to set on foot an "East-end Needlewomen's Workshop." It was set up under a joint committee of my father's friends and of outsiders. "Mostly," says Mr. Ludlow, "big folk who took, with the exception of one City missionary, no trouble whatever in the matter. The workshop was established in Wellclose Square, and was the first and last attempt we made at this kind of joint work."

To Mr. Ludlow.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

' July 24, 1851.

'I like the plan very much. Mrs. Maurice hopes you will think about a school for Red Lion Square: she fancies it will be more important than a crèche there. Mrs. H. was very anxious for a school.

'I think you had better not put my name on the committee. It seemed to me providential that Kingsley and I were out of the way, as our names were likely to disgust Lord Shaftesbury and his friends. But do as you think best for the cause. I had thought of proposing to take the rent of the house in Red Lion Square, for which I am responsible, upon myself. But perhaps you would wish it to be self-supporting, and this might destroy its character in that respect. Will you therefore put me down at present for £25; I hope to give more by-and-by.'

He spent the summer vacation in a cottage lent him by Mr. Marshall of Patterdale.

To Mrs. Maurice.

'Old Church Cottage, Ulleswater, near Penrith,

'MY DEAREST MOTHER,

' August 8, 1851.

'We reached this beautiful cottage about three o'clock yesterday, and found our servants, who had arrived a few hours before, and had everything ready for us. The dwelling is far prettier than we had expected, covered with plants and flowers, and in a garden going down to the lake. The lake is here very shallow, so that the children could come to no harm if they fell into it in any place within our domain; but we shall of course not allow them even to get a wetting if we can help it, and I do not think they are at all anxious for one. We are not quite at the most striking part of the lake, but it is very lovely, and at the back of the house we see the hills around in great glory.

‘Miss Holdsworth and the Sterlings are in great delight with their quarters, and the boys, I need not say, equally so. We are, however, setting to work this morning with lessons, and they seem rather anxious for some employment. I hope we may not look out merely for recreation, but really to receive some good, from all the beauty about us, that we may impart to others hereafter.’

To Archdeacon Hare. ‘September 13, 1851.

‘The lake and hills are looking gloriously in this bright weather, though they will bear clouds well, and perhaps are the better for them. We have been reading Ruskin’s chapters on clouds and water, trying a little to verify his observations. I do not know that we have done that, but at all events he is very instructive and sharpens one’s own faculty of seeing, which I find is naturally very dull.’

To Rev. M. Maurice.

‘Old Church, September 25, 1851.

‘MY DEAREST FATHER,

. . . . We hope to leave this beautiful place early on Monday morning, and to come homewards through Carlisle, Newcastle, Durham, York, Lincoln, and Cambridge. We shall then, if all be well, reach London late on Wednesday evening. I wish to show Georgina and the rest of our party some of the remarkable things in the north, as we may not soon come to it again; and Georgina has an especial wish to see Cambridge. The distance is not very much greater now that there are railways in all directions, and we shall see something of your old country, of which I had a glimpse a few years ago that made me wish to know more of it. We have had a very beautiful time here; September till to-day has been nearly as fine a month as I ever remember. Now the weather is breaking up, and we shall probably see little more of the sun. But the hills are glorious in all seasons.

'I have been busy looking over the proofs of some sermons on the Old Testament, which I hope soon to present to you. I am also writing on the Gospels. It will be a great delight and cause of thankfulness if I may give these to you all, as I have thought much of them, and there is nothing I so much wish to bring out. Those which are printed I should like to come and read to you if we are permitted to meet again. May God bless you, my dearest father.'

It will be convenient here to bring to a focus some of the views and thoughts which, at this and all times, determined my father's course through life.

The letters to his sister Priscilla, in early life, contain the frequent expression of an aspiration for the "spirit of a learner." Now this tone of mind—this desire to consider whatever came before him in the "spirit of a learner"—is the key-note of my father's life. This constant condition of his mind, that of a man looking up to a divine teacher, his Father, which is by no means always expressly avowed by him, precisely because it was so habitual with him, explains two very opposite observations in regard to him made by his friends. Dean Stanley, in the eloquent sermon preached on the Sunday after my father's death, spoke of the way in which every incident in the history of Europe and the world, and every wave of thought which passed over them, produced their impression and left their mark upon my father's mind and spirit. Yet some have said that his great characteristic was that he was entirely uninfluenced by other men. There is a sense in which both these statements are true, though I think that those who follow this life closely will see that the Dean's is very much the more true of the two. My father was not influenced by any other man in this sense, that he accepted as oracular their utterances; or that because of his regard and admiration for them he believed anything to be right, which if it had been brought before him by some very inferior person would not equally have impressed him. He was no respecter of persons. But no one who ever saw him among a knot of other men of whatever age, and whatever class, no one who ever sat with him whilst he was reading a newspaper, a novel, or the most learned of treatises, could have failed to notice this of him as his distinctive characteristic—that the thought that was always present to his mind was, “what are we to learn from this? what truth is there here?”

Mr. Kingsley has said of him: “if that character had a fault, it was this: that his humility was carried to an extreme; that unaware alike of his own intellectual and his own practical and governing power, he would submit at times when he ought to have ruled, and listen where he ought to have commanded. Save on one point—wherever the interests of duty, honour, chivalry, pity, mercy were, or even seemed in the least at stake, then the humble man became terrible, the docile man uncompromising, and from the gentlest of lips came forth a ‘Thou shalt not’ of noble indignation, even of noble scorn.”

But it was not merely of thoughts as they came from other men’s lips and pens that he was a “student.” The course of events seemed to him quite as much a part of the divine and fatherly education of the world, and he modified his position on many questions as he found reason to believe that certain of his ideas and thoughts had been proved not to be in accordance with the will of God, as it revealed itself in the progressive history of the time. His letters about the admission of the Jews to Parliament, and the succession of his letters about the relation of the clergy to education, will I think best illustrate this influence on his mind; but it was always potent.

Again, precisely because of the readiness with which he admitted any truth which was presented to him, it followed inevitably that at certain times certain truths pressed on him more forcibly than others, and though the central thought was never changed, the forms in which it found expression varied very much from time to time. This is somewhat quaintly shown in his correspondence, his letters to each of his friends having a generic type of their own, and in some cases his letters from the houses of different friends being also generically distinct.

Now, speaking broadly, of all this he was fully conscious. He was firmly convinced that no two men's education is exactly alike, and that it is not intended to be alike. Therefore he dreaded at all times lest he should make the thoughts which he felt he was bound to deliver as true, the authority which other men were to accept. Alike in his conversations, in his ordinary letters, and in his controversies, he endeavoured to place himself at the point of view of the man he was addressing. His appeal was not "here is this truth which I deliver to you as complete, and to be received by you without modification," but this: "you yourself must from your own premisses necessarily go with me thus far." His desire thus to deal with all other men as being under the same Teacher as himself, but having each been dealt with differently according to the method which was best for them, led him habitually to that form of an "argumentum ad hominem" which men in general almost resent as something inadequate if not unfair. From the same faith he resisted on all occasions the attempt to suppress opinion, no matter how much he might differ from it himself, lest in its suppression truths which had been brought home to other men, and which he had not seen so clearly, should be crushed. Though this motive will be seen constantly determining his action, his thoughts on the subject could scarcely be more fully illustrated than in the two consecutive letters on pp. 463 to 471, Vol. I. One of these is to Dr. Barry on the representative thinkers of the past, among whom he carefully selects as best worth reading many from whom he strongly differed: the second is to Mr. Scott on the question of working with men who took an altogether different standpoint from his own. He had, as a consequence of this desire for the free expression of opinion, an extreme reverence for the opinions of minorities, believing that truth when it first comes into the world is always to be found amongst minorities, and only gradually conquers the votes of majorities.

It follows that from his earliest years, and with an ever-increasing determination, he was the declared antagonist of what he considered the great idolatry of the day, the worship of Public Opinion and of the tendency to trample down those whose opinions do not coincide with what is supposed to be "Public Opinion." The contest on both sides became more and more bitter from the mode in which, on more than one occasion those who professed to be the exponents of public opinion privately endeavoured to coerce him into submitting to their dictates by threatening him with the consequences which would follow to himself if they turned their whole battery upon him. In every instance of the kind his resolution to fight to the last such an iniquitous perversion of a pretended appeal to the public conscience was instant and unchangeable.

The 'English Review' had begun this mode of warfare. The editor had in a short paragraph about one of my father's books made charges which, when called to account for them, he had been utterly unable to substantiate. Unwilling to apologise publicly for the mistake, but obliged privately to confess that he could find no passages to justify his charge, he sent my father a message threatening that, if pressed, he would make a sweeping attack upon the theological teaching at King's College. My father had at once defied the editor to do his worst, saying that only good could come to any of his colleagues from any exposure of their teaching that might follow. To this the editor had replied by the article which drew forth from Archdeacon Hare his letter, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour."

Similarly during a long course of years, whilst the Record was directing against my father one attack after another, the chief writer was continually making to him private overtures for peace. But my father caring very little for the injuries which the Record was certainly able to inflict upon prospects, which as has been seen he distinctly refused to set before himself, and with evidence continually coming before him of the moral mischief which the Record was doing—the envy, hatred, and uncharitableness, and the infidelity which it was spreading among the religious families to which it was admitted—utterly repudiated these overtures, and left to this man the consistent course of representing him publicly as a person of a kind whom no one ought to have as a friend, while privately he assured my father that he did not think he had an enemy in the world.

In September 1851, a fresh attack of a yet grosser kind appeared in a very different quarter.

It would nowadays be no surprise to most Englishmen to be told of any article, no matter how immoral or mean, having appeared in a “religious” newspaper, but that which I am about to give appeared in the most grave, Conservative and respectable of all the organs of public opinion. If these things were done in the green tree it may be judged what was done in the dry, and what measure of truth there was in the hailstorm of calumny with which at this time my father and his friends were assailed.

My father’s letter to the Bishop of London appears to have hit somewhat hard Mr. J. Wilson Croker, who at that time held a peculiar position in relation to the ‘Quarterly Review.’ He was not editor, but he had the right to insert certain articles whether the editor wished it or not. He had not, I believe, been himself the author of the article on “Queen’s College” in the ‘Quarterly Review,’ but he had been annoyed by the reply, and as the special friend of Lord Lyndhurst he had no doubt resented my father’s opposition in 1840. In the September number for 1851 Mr. Croker took his revenge.* The article is headed “Revolutionary Literature,” and collects a long list of French books, giving as the only English works except a Government report:

“‘Politics for the People,’ London, 1848. ‘The Message of the Church to Labouring Men,’ C. Kingsley. ‘Alton Locke,

* It should be said that Lockhart, who was editor at the time, made no secret of his disgust at the article. But then that fact did not reach one reader of it in a hundred.

Tailor and Poet: an Autobiography,' C. Kingsley. 'Yeast: a Problem,' C. Kingsley. 'Reasons for Co-operation': a lecture delivered at the office for Promoting Working Men's Associations. To which is added 'God and Mammon': a sermon to young men preached in St. John's District Church, St. Pancras, by F. D. Maurice, M.A., Chaplain of Lincoln's Inn, 1851."

After a number of pages devoted to showing that Socialism was the evil in the existing condition of France, Mr. Croker, turning to England, proceeds as follows, the italics being in every case in the original :

'The number and infamy of the cheap publications in which these principles are preached to the people, forbid one entering into any detailed examination of them; we rather choose to borrow a rapid, but able and accurate, sketch of their general aspect, which appeared in the leading article of the Times of the 3rd September last. Though it was then read, no doubt, by most of our readers, as well as by thousands of others, we are glad to reproduce and recall it to a somewhat less ephemeral existence. After some observations on the subject of national education, not dissimilar in general from those we have heretofore ventured to suggest as to education in Ireland, the writer proceeds—

“At the present moment, in the very heart of this apparently well-ordered community, there is an amount of evil teaching actively going on, quite enough to startle, if not to alarm the most firm-minded man among us. Systems the most destructive of the peace, the happiness, and the virtue of society, are boldly, perseveringly, and without let or hindrance, openly taught and recommended to the acceptance of the people with great zeal, if not with great ability. Cheap publications containing the wildest and most anarchical doctrines are scattered broadcast over the land, in which religion and morality are perverted and scoffed at, and every rule of conduct which experience has sanctioned, and on which the very existence of society depends, openly assailed; while in their place are sought to be established doctrines as outrageous as the maddest ravings of furious insanity—as wicked as the most devilish spirit could by possibility have devised. Murder is openly advocated—all property is declared to be robbery—the rules by which marriage is declared sacred and inviolate are treated as the dreams of dotage—obedience of every description is denounced as a criminal cowardice—law, as at present constituted, is asserted to be a mere device for enslaving mankind—and morality is described as an efficient auxiliary to law, for the same mischievous purpose.

* * * * *

[The quotation is continued through a couple of pages more, during which the Times reviewer gives extracts from the lowest possible type of inflammatory papers; then Mr. Croker resumes.]

‘All this seems, to use the eloquent writer’s expression, so terrible as to admit of no aggravation, and yet there is something worse behind—not, to be sure, in the doctrines themselves—worse is impossible; but in the means by which they are propagated.

‘Incredible as it may appear, there is, it seems, a clique of educated and clever, but wayward-minded men—the most prominent of them, two clergymen of the Church of England—who from, as it seems, a morbid craving for notoriety or a crazy straining after paradox, have taken up the unnatural and unhallowed task of preaching, in the press and from the pulpit, not indeed such open, undisguised Jacobinism and jacquerie as we have just been quoting, but, under the name of “Christian Socialism,” the same doctrines in a form not the less dangerous for being less honest. The first productions of this sect, or school, that attracted our notice, were the periodical tracts (since collected into a volume) called ‘Politics for the People.’ We are informed that the names of most of the contributors to this work are no secret, any more their respective shares in it. But we shall only mention those of the Rev. Frederick Maurice and the Rev. Charles Kingsley, who have affixed their names to other publications which seem to us of similar character and principles. Mr. Maurice, we understand, is considered the founder and head of the school, and it certainly adds to our surprise to find the reputed editor of 'Politics for the People' and the avowed author of other works, theological as well as political, of a still more heterodox character, occupying the professorial chair of Divinity in King's College, London.'

It may perhaps be thought that Mr. Croker was here simply misinformed, that he was not aware that the extracts in the Times article were taken from the very literature the hope of resisting the evil influence of which had produced the "Christian-Socialist" movement. Unfortunately the remainder of the article absolutely belies this idea. Mr. Croker quotes freely, in order to pervert their meaning, from papers which must have made him perfectly aware what the objects of the "Christian Socialists" were. The article was a conscious and deliberate attempt to represent the men who were at death-grip with these evils as if they were aiding and abetting them. And this was done at a time when, under the mistaken assumption which Mr. Croker's reading of their paper must have removed from his own mind, the advertisements of the Christian Socialists were refused insertion in most newspapers, and when most booksellers refused to keep copies of it, so that the 'Quarterly' reviewer could securely trust that his inversion of the fact would be received throughout the English world without a chance of reply. Mr. Croker figured before the world as specially anxious to conquer this particular mischief. The one contribution which he in fact offered to the fight was to bring false accusations against the men who had made real sacrifices to attain the very end he professed to aim at; men who had begun to work whilst he was sleeping.

Meantime, amid the hailstorm of which I have just given a specimen, the "promoters" worked on. It was extremely unlikely that any men would join such a body in the teeth of such a storm who were not pretty earnest in their convictions, and such earnestness is apt to be qualified with a tendency to assert with great fervour the importance of each man's personal opinions.

Every question, therefore, was discussed with no little warmth, and the process of drawing up the original constitution of the society had been a slow one.

For that purpose the promoters had met morning after morning at 6 A.M. at 458 New Oxford Street, not for the most part progressing more rapidly than some three or four words per hour. By this means a constitution had at length been drawn up which was embodied in No. 5 of the tracts on Christian Socialism.

By this constitution the Council of Promoters, which (vide p. 40) had been in existence long before the details were settled, was formed of twelve ordinary members besides the President, and an unlimited number of honorary and corresponding members; a constitution was provided for any body of workmen wishing to form an association, the great object of which was to assist the men to obtain as much protection from the law as the existing state of legislation permitted until a modification of the statutes on partnership could be obtained.

After the friends had begun work, Mr. Vansittart-Neale joined the council, ready to expend capital in the cause, and with many new ideas on the subject. Amongst other things, he suggested the formation of a central co-operative agency which, in his view and in Mr. Hughes's, was, as nearly as the law then permitted, a model of the great wholesale co-operative society which now does business with 1000 stores throughout the country. But in the then existing state of the law it appeared to them necessary, for the security of the money lent upon it, to form this agency into a trading company. Mr. Neale and Mr. Hughes became trustees for it. It had been for some time in existence when Mr. Ludlow, who had always disliked its form, had his attention directed to a circular which had been issued by this agency without reference to the Council of Promoters. On his return from a tour through the provinces in behalf of the movement, he brought the subject of the relationship of this agency to the council before the latter body. Not being able to attend the meeting of the council at which the matter was discussed, he wrote my father a letter to lay before the council. To this letter the following was an answer.

To Mr. Ludlow.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘November 7, 1851.

‘I did not deliver your letter last night to the council, but tore it up. For this very irregular proceeding I am open to any censure you please. I take upon myself the responsibility of it. I am sure that I did what was right. And now I call upon you frankly to say that what you did was wrong. I know well what a semblance there was in it of truth and adherence to principle. The devil deceives us continually with such semblances; by how many thousands have I been deceived? But you were really risking a principle—the whole principle of association and brotherhood, for the sake of a particular notion of yours respecting the necessary way of carrying it out.

‘I believe that the result to which we came last night goes really much farther than your “severance” would have done, because we shall now put our independent working upon a principle which we can and shall explain to the world, while yours would have looked very like a mere suspicion of particular persons.

‘We have solemnly declared, and shall tell the central board and the public, that we are distinct from the agency, and are not responsible for any of their acts. I am appointed on my own responsibility to say why this is so. This is accomplished without a schism, Neale and Hughes perfectly concurring in it. We are not pledged in any way individually or collectively to support the agency. I resisted Furnivall’s proposition that we should give any such pledge, as being an unfair compulsion upon members of the council, even supposing they were a minority, who might disapprove of the agency or any of its doings. If we cannot work with the members of the agency upon these terms, they or we must resign. We are bound to give them credit for a conscientious willingness to do so. I, at least, will not be a party to any excommunication of them, which I believe would be a schismatical act on our parts, most injurious to the working-men.

‘I earnestly implore you to work with me, that the dividing, warring, godless tendencies in each of our hearts which are keeping us apart, and making association impossible, may be kept down and extirpated. We cannot be Christian Socialists upon any other terms.

‘I am continually discovering fresh evils and heresies in myself. I want your help in destroying them.’

King's College was founded at the time when the need for a University, to which the sons of dissenters might be admitted, had led to the establishment of the University of London and of University College. The object of its founders had been to have a college distinctively to represent the teaching of the English Church in the heart of the Metropolis, in which the new college unconnected with her teaching was to be set up. As, however, it was necessary to collect funds by private subscription, it was essential that a place in the governing body should be given to the original subscribers. Hence in the constitution of the college two elements were introduced into the governing council. Twenty-four members of it were elected from the general body of the shareholders and members of the college. Eighteen consisted of governors, either ex-officio, viz. the Lord Chancellor, the Archbishop of York (the chairman), the Bishop of London, the Chief Justice of England, the Speaker, the Home Secretary, the Lord Mayor, the Dean of St. Paul's, and the Dean of Westminster; or personally named in the original charter, or the successors of those who were so named, as Sir Robert Inglis, the Duke of Rutland, the Marquis of Bristol, Marquis of Cholmondeley, Earl Brownlow, Earl Home, Earl of Harrowby, Lord Radstock.

Thus the majority consisted of wealthy peers of sufficiently strong ecclesiastical and religious feeling to have contributed largely to an institution intended to support the Church of England against dissent. It was tolerably certain, therefore, that such a body would pretty faithfully represent the current opinion of the wealthy classes upon religious subjects, and that at this particular period the current opinion represented would be that of which the Record was the travestie. Under such circumstances, the following correspondence represents what might naturally have been expected to occur after such an article as that in the 'Quarterly.'

It will be seen that Dr. Jelf's letters were laid before the council, so that I use them as public documents addressed to my father. His letters are from drafts, not in all cases complete, and from which some trifling alterations may have been made in the copy that was sent by him.

From Dr. Jelf to F. D. M.

'K. C., L., November 7, 1851.

'MY DEAR PROFESSOR MAURICE,

- 'It is with great reluctance that I write to you on a subject which has for some time engaged my painful and anxious attention.
- 'After the last meeting of the council, just as the members were departing, a conversation arose, in the course of which great uneasiness was expressed about you. The immediate occasion of the discussion was the article of the 'Quarterly,' which had just then appeared; but what was said referred not so much to the article itself—which few had read—as to the uncomfortable feeling which, independently of the article, was manifesting itself in various quarters. The impression seemed to be that you were unconsciously identifying yourself with language and designs of which you would be the first to disapprove.
- 'The result was, that I was requested in an unofficial way to consider the matter carefully. In compliance with that request I have, at such intervals of leisure as I could command, looked into the publications bearing upon Christian Socialism.

‘Setting aside the question as to the truth or falsehood of the economic theory which you are advocating, I have simply inquired whether your mode of handling the subject is such as to deserve the harsh language used by the reviewer, and I frankly declare that, while there seems much cause for regret that you should be devoting yourself to such an object, and while many of your expressions appear open to grave objections, yet I see nothing in any writings avowedly your own, inconsistent per se with your position as a professor of divinity in this college.

‘I wish I could end here, or that I could speak in similar terms of Mr. Kingsley’s writings; but it is unfortunately a part of my duty to speak plainly about him, and I confess that I have rarely met with a more reckless and dangerous writer. His mode of using Scripture is, to my mind, indescribably irreverent (I allude more particularly to the sermon* to which your letter is prefixed), and in general his arguments and language strike me as in a high degree inflammatory, such as without curing the rich of their faults, must set the poor against the rich—in fact, his language is occasionally almost insurrectionary.

‘Now you may very likely differ from Mr. Kingsley with regard to the tendency of such language. But forgive my saying that, while you are found on several occasions side by side with Mr. Kingsley—so much so that your name, with your designation as Professor of King’s College, is paraded in conjunction with his on large placards in inky characters in Fleet Street—you never, so far as I can discover, express the slightest disapprobation of what he says. I need not enlarge upon the consequences which such presumed approbation, unless openly disavowed, is likely to bring, not only upon the theological department, but even upon the department of general literature and science, and by implication upon the whole college.

* Strange how reverend critics disagree! This was the sermon which Bishop Blomfield, after he had read it, so entirely approved that he withdrew a censure he had pronounced on it before he had read it. It was the one which led to the shameful scene in which a London incumbent, who had invited Mr. Kingsley to his pulpit, with a full knowledge of Kingsley’s views, publicly denounced his guest in church.

- ‘All this is serious enough; but I will confess that my fears of the consequences have been much increased by what I read in yesterday’s Guardian. It is there stated that Mr. Kingsley is avowedly associated (and paraded in a placard) with several notorious infidels, as contributing articles to the Leader, a paper, I believe, advocating Socialism and Communism. In that paper a report is given of a funeral oration delivered by one of these associated writers over an infidel adulteress, in which he speaks of the “distorted memory of our own Paine.”
- ‘Now it is to be hoped that Mr. Kingsley will openly disavow this connection, or that you will openly disavow Mr. Kingsley. Otherwise it may be said justly, “Mr. Maurice is identified with Mr. Kingsley, and Mr. Kingsley is identified with Mr. Holyoake, and Mr. Holyoake is identified with Tom Paine. . . . There are only three links between King’s College and the author of the ‘Rights of Man.’
- ‘Let me entreat you to take prompt and decisive measures to vindicate your character, to vindicate ours, from these horrible imputations. It may not be too late. But the council is thoroughly alarmed, and unless you are prepared to allay their just apprehensions, the best advice which your most sincere friend could give you, would be to resign your office without delay.’

‘21 Queen’s Square, November 8, 1851.

‘MY DEAR MR. PRINCIPAL,

- ‘I found your letter on my return from the country this afternoon. I lose no time in answering it.
- ‘I do not wonder that you should have been astonished and alarmed by the article in the Guardian. I heard of its existence first from Mr. Kingsley this very morning : I have not seen it myself, but he tells me that the moment he read it he wrote an answer to this effect :—that he had never in his life written an article in the Leader, except a letter in refutation of some communistic and Owenite opinions which were defended by one of its contributors ; that the publication of his name on the list of its contributors was an impudent attempt to involve him in opinions which he utterly disclaimed and hated ; that Mr. Holyoake had personally attacked him on several occasions ; that he (Mr. Kingsley) had in a very marked manner, in letters expressly addressed to those who were likely to be Mr. Holyoake's readers, denounced his doctrines. I was perfectly aware of these facts before. I knew that Mr. Kingsley lived for no other purpose than to assert the truths which Mr. Holyoake and the writers in the Leader deny. I knew that he had been the means of delivering some directly from the infidelity which has spread so widely among the working classes, and that he had led numbers to feel an affection towards Christianity and the Church which they never felt before. Of course it is a matter of opinion—in some measure also a question of experience—whether he is taking a right or wrong method to effect these objects.

‘Those who have adopted an opposite method will of course condemn his. Those who have adopted an opposite method successfully can bring reasons for condemning him. But that these are the objects which are dear to him beyond any others in the world, I am certain. If I were to use any language, or to do any acts which should convey to the minds of any men the impression that I admitted any of the charges which have been made against him in the ‘Quarterly Review’ or elsewhere, I should be guilty of a dastardly falsehood.

‘Mr. Croker’s article in the ‘Quarterly Review’ was denounced in two newspapers of the highest respectability, the Morning Chronicle and the Spectator, as containing a series of shameful misrepresentations. With neither of these papers have I or has Mr. Kingsley the slightest connection, nor have they any sympathy with our economical views. An eminent judge told a near connection of mine that he ought not to answer the 'Quarterly' article in my behalf, or to let me answer it, because its iniquity was so very obvious. But if the council really believes any one of the charges which that article contained, I am ready to expose its statements sentence by sentence.

'Permit me to say, my dear sir, that these are far too serious to permit of my adopting the course which you as a friend have kindly suggested to me. I cannot resign my office while such insinuations are current respecting me. I should be unworthy of the position which I have occupied in your college, utterly unworthy to be a minister of the English Church, if I took such a step. I ask for a full examination of anything I have ever written or uttered in any way. If it should be found that I have been unfaithful to my trust, the council is bound to deprive me of it. If not, I ought to have a full acquittal.

'I do not ask the least mercy of the council; but I ask them as English gentlemen not to [pronounce judgment before they have received any but anonymous evidence.]*'

'K. C., L., November 9, 1851.

'MY DEAR PROFESSOR MAURICE,

'I must just thank you for your letter, which I need not say most triumphantly refutes all imputations connected with the Holyoake notion, and I am thankful to say completely annihilates any apprehensions on that score. The residuum of my anxieties I shall now be able to deal with more calmly; and as soon as I have leisure I will communicate with you again.

'I presume you will have no objection to my imparting to the council on Friday the substance, if not the letter, of your answer. I hope you do not fancy that I advised you to resign—I only put it as an alternative. With respect to the Holyoake affair you have taken the other alternative.

* Incomplete.—F. M.

‘I think we might still devise some method (without any compromise of your high-minded resolves) to bring the remainder of the suspicions against you under the same alternative, i.e. that of “allaying the just apprehensions of the council.”

‘Be assured that as no one would rejoice more than myself at such a solution of our embarrassments, so no one would more sincerely deplore the severance of our connection.’

‘21 Queen’s Square, November 12, 1851.

‘MY DEAR MR. PRINCIPAL,

‘I write these lines in consequence of some remarks which fell from you in the course of our conversation this morning.

‘It has been objected to me and to some of my friends that we are countenancing doctrines, and promoting practices, which are connected in a great many minds with a disbelief in Christianity, which are connected in the minds of most with the subversion of order and property. I answer that we have tried to teach the working-men in our words what we have tried to show them by our acts—that Christianity is the only means of promoting their well-being and counter-acting the moral evils which lie at the root of their physical evils. I answer again that we have protested against the spirit of competition and rivalry, precisely because we believe it is leading to anarchy, and must destroy at last the property of the rich as well as the existence of the poor.

‘It is objected that we do not fully believe in the Bible as an authoritative teacher, and seek for some modern rationalistic way of explaining its origin, or its doctrines, or its facts.

‘I answer—we have found an unbelief in the authority of the Bible very common among the working-men; we have found infidel notions of all kinds prevailing among them; we have found these notions gaining immense strength from the notion that the Scripture refers to a future world, and not to the present.

‘Our great object has been to encounter this infidelity, by showing them that the Bible, taken in its most simple literal sense, declares God to be the present ruler of the world, and that if they have faith in Him and in His word, they will find a help and teacher in their daily perplexities, in their common life, which will save them from resorting to demagogues as ignorant as themselves. We are therefore obliged to discredit all fantastical neological notions of the Bible, and to present it as the authentic declaration of God's mind and will to His creatures.

‘It has been objected that there is a strong public opinion against us, and that it is exhibited in the attacks which have been made upon us in different journals. I answer that there is a strong opinion against us, and that the journals faithfully represent the nature and quality of it. I will, therefore, enumerate the opponents who have helped most to form this public opinion.

‘First, we were denounced in the first article of the ‘Edinburgh Review’ for last January—an article which was much praised and pronounced to be decisive in a great many circles. It was written by Mr. Greg, a gentleman, I believe, of unexceptionable character and much benevolence, but who has since published an elaborate attack on the Old Testament and the inspiration of the Scriptures. Secondly, we have been bitterly and perseveringly assailed in the Daily News, a paper of considerable circulation, supporting the views of Mr. Cobden, and as hostile to the English clergy as any which appears in Great Britain. Thirdly, we have been much abused in the Tablet, the most ferocious of Roman Catholic organs. Fourthly, we have been thought worthy of more than one attack by the Eclectic Review, the organ of the most democratic English dissenters. Lastly, we have been mixed up with the revolutionary writers of France in the last ‘Quarterly Review’ by Mr. Croker, who, if he has been somewhat more openly and outrageously unscrupulous in his false quotations of us than of those whom he has previously reviewed, yet has had the honour of libelling nearly every person (Mr. Wilberforce and Mr. Harcourt were among them) who have made earnest efforts for the good of every class of their fellow-creatures—who has the further honour of being the chosen friend and agent of a nobleman who These have been our assailants. The journals which have spoken with toleration and kindness of us have nearly all been strongly religious journals, and of different schools—a High Church ‘Quarterly Review’ (from which personally I had no right to look for any favour); a Scottish Quarterly Review established by Dr. Chalmers and Dr. Brewster, the organ of the Free Church party; and the Watchman, the most moderate of the Wesleyan papers. It has been objected to me individually, that as a professor in a college I have no business to occupy myself with associations of working-men. I answer: both my colleagues in the theological department are occupied most beneficially to themselves and to others, out of college hours, in parochial duties, one in London, the other in the country; both of them in writing books, one of them in special labours for his Hebrew brethren. One of my colleagues in the general department has the care of the soldiers of London; all I believe have some duties or other which bring them in contact with persons of a different rank, besides those whom they teach in the college.

‘ Their classes in the college I believe are infinitely the better for their labours and studies out of it. I think it should be shown, not taken for granted, that mine are the worse for any humble tasks in which I may have been engaged.

‘ If they can be shown to be evil in themselves, I am condemned of course. If not, I venture to submit that they are not made evil by my connection with the college. Should the council see fit to decree that I should cease to aid the efforts of those friends who are striving to improve the physical and moral condition of the working-men, or cease to be a professor in the college, I shall, without a moment’s hesitation, take the latter alternative.

‘ For there are hundreds of men in the English Church ready and able to fill the honourable offices which I should vacate. There are not at present many (I have no doubt there will be soon a great number) who feel as strongly as I do, that, unless we on our side strive heart and soul to show the working classes that the Church is their best friend, and is ready to make every sacrifice for their sake, we shall not only lose all hold over them, but over the upper classes to which we have sacrificed them. Of course this conviction of mine is nothing to the council or to any one else, but it is everything to me, and therefore, with God's help, I shall act upon it.'

'K. C., L., November 14, 1851.

'MY DEAR PROFESSOR MAURICE,

'The correspondence which has passed between us was read to-day in the council, and a clerical committee of inquiry, to include myself, was named. No one will rejoice more cordially than I shall do, if the result is such as to "allay the just apprehensions of the council."

To Archdeacon Hare.

MY DEAR JULIUS,

'November 19, 1851.

'Very hearty thanks for Esther's letters and yours. I entirely agree with you about my own duty in this business. I think also with you that I ought to be very thankful that the secret mutterings have brought forth an open act, and that I have an opportunity of explaining myself. I am perfectly satisfied with the tribunal to which my conduct is submitted; if I had had to choose, I should have made scarcely any alterations. I expect all justice from them, but I do not expect that I shall retain my place in the college. They are appointed to consider what may be done to "allay the just apprehensions of the council." Now I can do nothing whatever to allay them. If I gave up the working associations, which I believe would be a great sin, I should feel myself obliged to begin some similar undertaking the next day. I cannot promise to be less responsible for the teaching of the society than heretofore. I shall probably be more responsible, as the promoters wish to make their teaching more definitely Christian, and therefore propose to put it under my direction. I shall confess no imprudences, for though I may have been guilty of thousands, the word might mean one thing to the council and quite another to me. I shall not disclaim any friend or consent to give up the name "Christian Socialism," or pledge myself to avoid any acts in future which have given offence in time past. I should merely patch up a momentary reconciliation if I did any of these things, and be accused continually of violating the compact. Therefore my best hope is that the clerical committee should express general approbation of my behaviour as far as the college has been concerned, should speak honourably of the Socialist movement, and should then recommend me to depart; which recommendation, upon these conditions, I should at once comply with. For I should get a clerical, even an Episcopal sanction for the associations; I should cease to be under a government which will never regard me except with suspicion; and the Church would not be committed with the working-men, and the freedom of my colleagues could not be prejudiced by any unfair treatment of me. This, therefore, is the result which I look forward to as both probable and desirable. At the same time, I hope that I shall do nothing to precipitate a decision of this kind. And I am quite sure that God will manage the matter better than I should.

'There is not the least reason why you should come to town, and I hope you will not think of it, at least not till you come naturally in December. I am sure the judges will be inclined to be only too partial to me. I do not fancy that of the laymen in the council; but the clergy, with the exception perhaps of Harrison, have not I should think an atom of prejudice against me. The Bishop of London may suspect me occasionally, but I have no reason to think that he has any habitually unkind impressions about me.

'Georgina sends her best love, and joins with me in the desire that you will not interrupt better employments out of kindness to me. I cannot say how much I care about your love, but I foresee no issue for which all who love me may not unite with me in being thankful.'

'MY DEAR JULIUS,

'November 22, 1851.

'I have not the least dream of becoming editor of the Christian Socialist. I have been too often burnt in the periodical fire not to have a reasonable dread of it. I opposed the undertaking at first, but was overruled by Ludlow's strong feeling of its necessity. What will be done with it now is uncertain.

'The tract which I enclose, and which you may not have seen, was written to meet some difficulties which have arisen recently in our movement. In conformity with the maxims of it, one of the promoters, the least definitely Christian among them, wishes me to undertake the responsibility of all the publications issued by the society, in order that it may have a thoroughly Christian character, and yet that individual members may not be held to more than they believe. I have asked him to suspend his proposal for the present, and he has done so. But I do not know that I can ultimately refuse to assume a position which I certainly did not seek, but which may have the effect of making our purposes and methods more consistent. I should not do more; I should only suggest works to others and overlook them.

'Many thanks for all your kind words. I am delighted that you and Esther think with me that I must give up everything rather than the work of association.'

To Mr. J. N. Langley.

'21 Queen's Square, Bloomsbury, November 26, 1851.

'MY DEAR SIR,

'Letters come like all things else under a divine guidance—just when they are wanted. I should have to tell you a long story if I explained why yours reached me just at the moment when I was in need of the encouragement which it brought. A little before, some rather hard words which had their own commission, and I hope executed it, had crushed me rather more than was right: yours were a message of another kind, and showed me how wonderfully wounds and smarts are weighed and tempered by the Great Physician.

“However, that is a somewhat selfish way of looking into the deeply interesting annals of your experience which you have furnished me with. It is exceedingly comfortable to think how individual that experience is, and yet how general; how each person has to go through it himself, and to feel it as his own, and yet how much it is the type of his age—of his nation, of his kind. It is that kind of discipline we are all undergoing—that kind of lesson each of us has to learn—that we may be Independents and Churchmen, neither without the other, distinct beings and members of a body. If I have helped you through any steps of the process, God be thanked. The human agency is a very blessed part of His economy; still the best any one of us can do is to teach his brother how he may do without him, and yet not cease to care for him.

“I should think from your direction that you must be living with an old acquaintance of my family—at least the elders of his with the elders of mine—Mr. Dowson. You will judge from this that I have some connection and early sympathy with Unitarians as well as other dissenters; one which I believe binds me to the fulfilment of some tasks which I have much and sinfully neglected. I think I know the evil of Unitarianism and the good which might be brought from beneath that evil better than many. The deeper my conviction of the truth of the name into which we are baptized as the ground and reconciliation of all truth has become, the more have I felt a desire to recognise that which I believe they hold or are trying to hold; the more strongly and passionately I believe in a universal atonement and sacrifice, the more do I desire to extricate them from some of the confusions into which the narrow and dark representations of that master-principle and key-note of social harmony have driven them.

“I shall be delighted to hear from you on these and all kindred topics, and all that are interesting you. My answer is very unworthy of the letter which called it forth, but you must excuse it as I have a good deal of business, and some of a rather trying kind, just now on my hands.'

From Dr. Jelf.

'King's College, London, December 20, 1851.

'MY DEAR PROFESSOR MAURICE,

'I am requested by the council to forward to you the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the tendency of certain of your own writings, and also of certain others which appear to have been sanctioned by you; the copy which I enclose having been furnished to me by order of the council for that purpose:—

'“The Committee appointed the 14th of November, 1851, for the purpose of considering, in conjunction with the Principal, the tendency of certain works alleged to have been published by the Rev. F. D. Maurice, resolve to make the following report:

“1. The Committee desire in the first place to record their grateful sense of the value of Professor Maurice's services, of the earnest zeal with which he discharges the duties of his office, and especially of the beneficial influence which he exercises over the students of the college generally, and of the theological department in particular; and they see no ground for an abatement of confidence in the soundness of his theological teachings as a professor in this college.

“2. With respect to the particular subject which the committee were appointed to consider, they are well assured that, whatever may be the merits or demerits of what is called 'Christian Socialism' considered as an economic theory, the scheme which has been set forth under that designation—a designation in their opinion not happily chosen—is believed by those who have devised it to be the most effectual antidote to 'Socialism' commonly so called; and the committee cannot doubt that Professor Maurice has lent his aid to the carrying out of that scheme, under a deep sense of his responsibility to the Church, and in a spirit of genuine Christian philanthropy directed to the removal of great social evils, the existence of which is acknowledged and deplored.

"The Committee entertain a high sense of the feelings and motives which have prompted him to such efforts; and, allowance being made for occasional obscurity or want of caution in certain modes of expression, there appears to them to be nothing in his own writings on this subject, which does not admit of a favourable construction or which is inconsistent with his office as professor of divinity in this college.

"3. At the same time the committee cannot refrain from expressing their regret at finding that Professor Maurice's name has been mixed up with publications on the same subject which they consider to be of very questionable tendency, so as to give rise to a general impression in regard to him which the committee are persuaded is not warranted by the character of his teaching in the college."

' 21 Queen's Square, December 20, 1851.

' MY DEAR MR. PRINCIPAL,

' I beg to thank you for forwarding to me the report which was received and adopted* at the meeting of the council yesterday.

' I cannot be sufficiently grateful for the language in which that report is expressed, and for the kindness with which I have been treated by you and by the council on this and on every other occasion.

' I cannot think that individually I have any right to the approbation which the council has bestowed upon my teaching, but I thankfully accept it as a testimony of the confidence which the governing body of the college has in those to whom the care of the students is committed. I hope to show by greater zeal and diligence how much we all feel the value of such encouragement.

' I thank the council also most sincerely for their remarks upon my proceedings out of the college. Nothing can be more generous, I must add more just, than their explanation of the reasons which have led me and others to adopt the phrase "Christian Socialism" as descriptive of our opinions.

* This was a mistake of my father's; the report of the clerical committee had not been adopted by the council.—Vide infra.

'Our object has been to separate, in what seemed to us the most effectual way, that Socialism, which Mr. Southey * and other eminent Conservatives believed to be the best solution of the practical difficulties of England, from Communism, Red Republicanism, or any anarchical opinion whatsoever.

'We did not feel ourselves justified in giving even that modified support to some of Mr. Owen's economical views which Mr. Southey so freely tendered to them, unless we could bear a more emphatic and decided protest than he bore against Mr. Owen's religious sentiments and theories. We did not adopt the word "Christian" merely as a qualifying adjective. We believe that Christianity has the power of regenerating whatever it comes in contact with, of making that morally healthful and vigorous which apart from it must be either mischievous or inefficient. We found, from what we know of the working-men in England, that the conviction was spreading more and more widely among them, that Law and Christianity were merely the supports and agents of capital. We wished to show them both by words and deeds that Law and Christianity are the only protectors of all classes from the selfishness which is the destruction of all. So far as we can do this, we are helping to avert those tremendous social convulsions, which, as recent experience proves, may be the effect of lawless experiments to preserve property, as well as of violent conspiracies against it.

'I certainly felt when I engaged in those tasks that I was carrying out the main principle of the college, which treats the Church as the great instrument of intellectual and social improvement; and though I felt no temptation to use my lectures for the purpose of preaching any opinion which was peculiar to myself, I have felt that I was practically illustrating the lessons which I have learnt myself and endeavoured to teach my pupils in national and ecclesiastical history. If I have committed any serious mistakes or have led others to commit them while I have been pressing this object, I am glad to receive the correction of judges so able and so impartial as those to whom my conduct has been submitted. In any trifling efforts which I have'*

* The point of this reference to Southey is that Southey had been himself the Editor of the 'Quarterly.'

The next letter is a public one, which was read and entered on the minutes of the council.

' 13 Beacon, Exmouth, December 51, 1851.

' MY DEAR MR. PRINCIPAL,

' I received an official intimation from the secretary of King's College, that the council, on the 14th of November last, had appointed a committee to examine into certain parts of my conduct respecting which you had written to me previously. I expressed to you at that time, in a private interview, my gratitude to the council for their compliance with my wish, conveyed to them through you, that my acts and words in and out of the college might be submitted to a thorough investigation. As you have transmitted to me, by direction of the council, the report which embodies the judgment of the committee, I may now venture to express more formally my thanks for the kindness with which I have been treated, on this and on every other occasion, by the governing body of the college. The part of the report which alludes to my relations with the students of the general and theological departments will, I trust, have the effect of urging me to labour more diligently, so long as I am connected with the college, that I may deserve a commendation which I feel has been far too liberally bestowed, and with too little knowledge of the defects of which my conscience bears witness. The passages which allude to those proceedings out of the college which have exposed me to especial animadversion, I feel to be most generous. The one which explains the reasons that have induced me and others to adopt the name of "Christian Socialists," I must also claim as most just. We certainly believe that the Socialism which Mr. Southey, and other eminent Conservatives, accepted as a solution of some of the greatest practical difficulties of England, if it were based upon Christianity, might be the most powerful protection of the land against anarchical notions and practices, whether taking the name of Socialism or adopted as precautions against it. We have formed small associations among working-men for the carrying on of their own trades, in which the Sunday is a day of rest, intemperance is checked, political agitation is discouraged. We know that by so doing we have led some workmen to see the folly and danger of strikes, that we have provoked the hostility of many incendiaries, that we have especially offended those who were using the distresses of the lower orders as arguments for infidelity. The efforts in which I have taken part for these objects are very limited and inconsiderable. As an individual I have done almost nothing to aid them. I believe that the fact that a clergyman holding office in your college is connected with them has helped to diminish some prejudices which a portion of the working class entertained against his order, and to make their minds more ready for the reception of Christian teaching. If there is any singularity in my position, no one would rejoice so much as myself that it should be removed by the general co-operation of my brethren, and that I should be as little noticed in the crowd as I ought to be.

* Remainder not in draft.

‘The report speaks with great kindness of some responsibility which the committee believe I have incurred in the opinion of the public for the statements of other persons. I am bound to say that if I have ever put myself forward presumptuously and unnecessarily as a defender of my friends, I have done so, not in consequence of their solicitations, but in spite of them. I had the strongest convictions, from my intimate knowledge of them, that their objects were thoroughly Christian, that they were earnest and devoted members of the Church of England, that they abhorred revolutions as much as I did. If any expressions of theirs had led good and wise men to a different conclusion, or had given those, who were neither, a handle for misrepresenting them, I wished to assert what I felt to be the truth respecting them, the more because I was certain that they possessed talents and powers of usefulness which did not belong to me, and that their temptations, though not greater than mine, were of an entirely different kind.

‘ Though I cannot retract one word which I have said in their favour, I am convinced that it would have been better for them if I had been silent. I ought to have known that I had no credit or popularity of my own, which could make me fit to be a voucher for others. If I offer this conviction to the committee as a security against the danger to which I have exposed, as they think, the college and myself, rather than any direct pledges as to my future conduct, it is because I am persuaded that such pledges when special, are not applicable to new circumstances, when general, are open to a number of different interpretations. The tenderness with which the committee has treated my conduct, even when it seemed to them blameable, might tempt me to use phrases which would express my desire to conform in all respects to their wishes. I believe real gratitude to them rather obliges me to indulge in no vague professions. I am sure I am not worthy to continue one of the teachers of the college a moment longer than I retain the confidence of those who have shown such anxiety to allow for my mistakes and defend my intentions.

‘ I cannot expect or even hope that the organs of public opinion in the religious world will treat me more favourably than they have done hitherto, or will hesitate to identify me not only with friends whom I honour and love, but with those whom they and I feel that we are solemnly pledged to resist. Should it seem to the council that the censures of the press are so detrimental to the college that it cannot retain a professor who is subject to them, I shall at once bow to that judgment and resign my office. But I hope they will find that one who does not acknowledge the authority of newspapers is most willing to submit to yours, and most rejoiced that he is bound to obey the chairman of the council* as his father in God!

‘It may be right to mention that the paper called the Christian Socialist, to which I said in a former letter that I had contributed, will, after the beginning of the year, cease to contain any political or general articles, and will be entitled the Journal of Association.’

‘MY DEAR JULIUS,

‘December 31, 1851.

‘All blessings of the old and new year be with you all. I had hoped this letter would have reached you on New Year’s Day. But I am afraid it is not possible, as you have no day post, but the second has a good mark in my calendar,† and every day in the year I trust may be a holy one to us and you.

‘My interview with Dr. Jelf led me to think that he was afraid of venturing a step beyond the strict direction of the council, I suppose because he knows that some members of it are in nowise well-affected to me, and might make any overdoing of his an excuse for opening the question again. All he said of me and my teaching was most kind; but he seemed annoyed that I should dictate to the council in what way they ought to deal with me. Under these circumstances I do not think it would be fair to him, or safe for myself, to write to the Bishop of London. I enclose the letter which I sent yesterday to the Principal, and which he will read on Friday week (I presume) to the council. I have altered my previous letter, not only because it assumed that the council had adopted the report, but because Dr. Jelf seemed to think that I had evaded the intention of the report in the passage respecting responsibility for the writings of others. It did not refer, he said, to the Christian Socialist, but to the letters and prefaces I had written in support of Kingsley. My impression is that I shall not be meddled with; if I am, the testimony of the clerical members of the council in my favour is of far greater worth to me than any censure from the rest.

* Bishop Blomfield.

† The day he became engaged to marry Miss Hare.

‘I can think of nothing more terrible than the combination of Louis Napoleon, the representative of the triumph of money and the sword over law, order and faith, with Montalembert and the whole priest party. It is a nearer approximation to that complete embodiment of Antichrist which our prophets look for in our time than I was prepared for; though I have long thought that many of their guesses have a kind of inspiration which is totally unconnected with any wisdom, or truth, in the interpretations.’

To Rev. M. Maurice.

‘13 Beacon, Exmouth, December 31, 1851.

‘MY DEAREST FATHER,

‘I hope this letter will reach you on the first day of the new year, and will bring you all the best and dearest wishes which we can offer you for the time that is coming. Julius says we ought to wish every one a happy old year instead of a happy new one; that is to say, I suppose, we should wish that all the time which is past should be full of good recollections, and so should be a pledge of good hopes. I cannot desire anything so good for you, my dearest father or for myself and all that are dear to me, as that we should know the blessings which do not belong to one year or another, but which are the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever—which are very near us, and which are stored up in Christ for all who will receive them. I have felt more of late than ever before how close the invisible kingdom is to us, and how strange it is that we do not more enter into it and apprehend the treasures of it. May God teach us all how Christmas explains to us the years that are past and those which are to be, here or in another world.

‘You said you should like to see the judgment of the committee appointed by King’s College upon me. I enclose it for you. I am very grateful for it, as much for the sake of those who love me as for my own.’

From Dr. Jelf.

'King's College, London, January 17, 1852.

'MY DEAR PROFESSOR MAURICE,

'In your official letter addressed to me there is a passage which is open to misconstruction, and to which I think it right to recall your attention.

'You say: "Although I cannot retract one word which I have said in their favour, I am convinced that it would have been better for them if I had been silent."

'Now you will see that in the point of view taken by the council it is no part of their business to consider whether your defence of certain writers was better for those writers. All the council are concerned with is, the question whether it would not have been better for King's College if you had been silent—and I would submit to you, whether it would not have been wiser for you to look at the matter as if you were in the council's place, and whether you might not even now add the words, "as well as for King's College." This would surely be as true a statement of your convictions as that which you have made; in fact, it would make your statement complete. As it now stands you seem to ignore the fact that your silence would have been better for the college.

'While on the subject of your letters, I could honestly mention another point on which there is something I could desiderate. Would it be too much to expect of you, considering the delicate treatment you have received of the committee, that you should add somewhere, "that you will do your utmost to bear in mind the duty and importance of not compromising the college"?

'You would give no further pledge by words like these, than what every professor impliedly undertakes virtute officii. But this insertion would remove the impression felt by some (forgive my candidly stating that impression) that you are too proud or too obstinate to condescend to allay the just apprehensions of the council. You will understand that this communication is the result of my own reflection alone; and made in the earnest desire that this unhappy business may by common consent be brought to a satisfactory conclusion.'

'MY DEAR MR. PRINCIPAL,

'January 21, 1852.

'If I had alluded to the opinions or interests of my friends, or of myself, for any other purpose than that of allaying the apprehensions of the council, I should have been guilty of more than all the impertinence which you impute to me. I said that my friends did not desire my apologies, and I believed that I had done them harm, to prove that I was not likely to repeat the acts which the committee had complained of.

'Practical men I knew valued practical securities more than vague professions. I could offer no greater security than this, that my defences of my friends had in my judgment failed of the purpose for which I made them. If I had said that they injured the college, I should have said what I did not know. If I had said that they might prove injurious to it, I should only have repeated what the committee had said with an authority to which I bowed, and to which my words could add no weight. You ask me to give a pledge that I will not hereafter do anything to compromise the college. I should be most happy to use those words if I could attach to them any definite meaning.

'But it seems to me that an unconscientious man would readily take such a pledge, because he would be sure that he could always explain it away, that a conscientious man who had taken it could scarcely preach a sermon without asking himself whether there were no words in it which might offend some person, who had a son in the college, or who might think of sending one to it. The generous treatment I have received from the committee does not appear to me a reason for resorting to ambiguous language, when the language of the report is so grave, distinct, and courteous.

'The council requires that its professors should be citizens, churchmen, in some cases clergymen. It assumes that, in these characters, they have contracted certain general obligations, before they contracted the special obligations which belong to them in virtue of their office. I have always felt that these special obligations are very real and binding. I have never fancied that I had the least right to allow any theories of mine respecting education, any plans respecting the particular department entrusted to my care, any caprices, tastes, private convenience, to interfere with the principles, administration, harmonious working of the society into which I had sought and obtained admission. These elder duties I have endeavoured to consider and fulfil on their own grounds; though I have never forgotten that the council had the fullest right to remove me from my position in the college at any moment, if on any account whatsoever I had lost their confidence. If you have found me "proud and obstinate" in that sphere of action, in which, during eight years, you have had an opportunity of observing me closely, I am sure you will call upon the council, for that reason, to dismiss me from my office. But I submit that there are other motives, besides pride and obstinacy, which may make me desirous that the council should determine, after a strict examination of my conduct, and not in consequence of any pledges general or special, whether they can or cannot continue to trust me as a teacher in this college.

'P.S.—I would earnestly request that this letter, with the one to which it is an answer, may be laid before the council at their meeting on Friday.'

From the Secretary.

'DEAR SIR,

'King's College, London, January 23, 1852.

'I beg to forward to you the enclosed resolutions passed at a special meeting of the council held this day.'

Extracts from the minutes of the council of King's College, London, held January 23, 1852:—

'RESOLVED,

'That the council receive with satisfaction the report of the committee "that Professor Maurice's services have been of great value, that he has discharged the duties of his office with earnest zeal, and that he has exercised a beneficial influence over the students of the college, and that there is no ground for an abatement of confidence in the soundness of his theological teaching as a professor in the college.

That with reference to the tendency of certain writings of Professor Maurice, the council are relieved from much anxiety by the assurance of the committee that allowance being made for occasional obscurity, or want of caution in certain modes of expression, there appears to them to be nothing in Professor Maurice's own writings on the subject of Christian Socialism which does not admit of a favourable construction, or which is inconsistent with his office as professor of divinity in this college.

That the council participate in the regret expressed by the committee at finding that Professor Maurice's name has been mixed up with publications on the same subject, which they consider to be of very questionable tendency, so as to give rise to a general impression with regard to him which the committee are persuaded is not warranted by the character of his teaching in the college.

That the deepening or simple continuance of such impression on the public mind would be likely to produce consequences to the college which the council are persuaded no one will regret more seriously than Professor Maurice, but they feel warranted in entertaining a confident hope from the tenor of his letter to the Principal of December 30, 1851, as well as from the zeal which he has always displayed for the interest of the college, that, by increased caution for the future on his part, any further measures on theirs will be rendered unnecessary.'

The differences between the report of the committee and the resolution adopted by the council are very suggestive. It is evident that the hostile Lords had never calculated that an investigation gravely conducted by the Bishop of London (Blomfield), Dr. Jelf, the Dean of St. Paul's (Milman), Archdeacon Harrison, Rev. J. S. M. Anderson, could result in a decision which would be so diametrically contrary to the dictates of current public opinion. As will be seen hereafter, they did not forget the lesson, and resolved that in future they would incur no such risks of a judicial investigation of facts interfering with the carrying out of the righteous decrees of current popular religious periodicals. Even this modified resolution of the council was not carried without considerable opposition, despite the report of the committee.

CHAPTER III.

"Many of us persuade ourselves, all of us have probably at one time yielded to the opinion that reputation is necessary for the sake of usefulness. Every hour, I think, will show us more and more that the concern about reputation is the great hindrance to usefulness; that if we desire to be useful, we must struggle against it night and day."—F. D. M.

1852.—THE GREAT IRON TRADES STRIKE—UNWILLINGNESS TO URGE IMMEDIATE CO-OPERATION ON THE MEN; OR TO DO ANYTHING TO MAKE THE SPLIT BETWEEN EMPLOYERS AND EMPLOYED MORE PERMANENT—MR. KINGSLEY'S 'WHO ARE THE FRIENDS OF ORDER?'—RENEWED CONFERENCES WITH WORKING-MEN—MR. SLANEY'S BILL AT LENGTH GIVES LEGAL FORM TO THE CO-OPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS—THE CHARTER OF QUEEN'S COLLEGE OBTAINED SOON AFTERWARDS—MR. KINGSLEY'S 'PERSEUS' AND 'PHAETHON'—LORD GODERICH ON "THE DUTY OF THE AGE"—F. D. M. ON DEMOCRACY—A DIGGER.

A GREAT strike and lock-out on an enormous scale throughout the engineering and iron trades of the country now occupied the attention of the promoters. Some of the men had threatened a strike for December 31, 1851. The masters replied by a general lock-out on January 10, 1852.

A year earlier representatives of the executive of the men's amalgamated society had consulted the Council of Promoters as to the most profitable mode of employing their accumulated funds; and for more than eighteen months the question of co-operation had been discussed in the iron trade.

The promoters had thus become personally acquainted with many of the men engaged in the new struggle.

Some of the promoters endeavoured to bring about a reconciliation between masters and men; others wished to urge the men to join all together in a grand co-operative society; others wished the men to take advantage of any offers made them by individual masters, since the employers were by no means united, and to form associations only of picked men.

My father was very anxious to prevent any false step from spreading ruin and injuring the future relationships of employers and employed, under pretence of offering a nostrum to the acceptance of the men. He had no small amount of resistance to encounter from some of the more eager champions of co-operation as the immediate remedy for every ill.

Mr. Ludlow had given up the editorship of the Christian Socialist to Mr. Hughes at the beginning of the new year, when it became the Journal of Association. A very powerful appeal to the men of the amalgamated trades, which appears in the number of the Journal for January 24, was forwarded to my father by Mr. Ludlow, and to this the next letter refers. Mr. Ludlow was surprised that my father should have forwarded this letter (which is written strongly in behalf of co-operation, but is at the same time an appeal to all the self-sacrifice, pluck, and character of the men), whilst yet my father himself was at the council urging patience and moderation. Like most of my father's friends, he assumed at the time that my father's wish, that an earnest and honest expression of thought should not be checked, implied that he agreed with the conclusions arrived at by the writer. Intellectually it was a misunderstanding of the same kind as that of the religious newspapers. The consistency, with which my father adhered throughout life to the principle of aiding the expression of opinions from which he differed, was not easily recognised in each separate instance of it.

To Mr. Ludlow.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘January 28, 1852.

‘I kept your letter back for one or two posts, that I might do nothing hastily. I feel sure, however, that nothing but good can come from words so full of love and sincerity. I have therefore sent it on. It does express faithfully what seems to me at present the best, I should say the only possible, course. If God opens my eyes to see that I am wrong, I hope I shall at once confess it; if He shows me any way in which I can lawfully give help, I think I shall not be slow to take it. I may be nervously afraid of overdoing. I know you think I am, in a great many cases; but I have suffered from the overdoing of others, and I have sinned in that way, not once or twice, myself. I hope it is not altogether cowardice, though I may have a great leaven of it, which makes me tremble to run where I have no message, or am not sent. I know God is working; if I may work with Him, it is a blessing unspeakable; but to let His working by mine is terrible. However, I have infinite reasons for asking forgiveness of my friends, as well as of Him, for omissions, as well as commissions, innumerable. I shall in time wear out their patience, not, I trust, that which is absolute and eternal.

Also to Mr. Ludlow.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘January 31, 1852.

‘I did not at once answer your letter, for the task of self-justification becomes every day more irksome to me, and I am beginning in most cases to prefer that judgment should go by default against me. But as far graver matters than my character are at stake, I will say a few words on the points to which you allude. . . .

‘I am urging that we should not in any case run before we are sent, or till we have a message, and that it requires very great and earnest consideration to know where we are sent, and what our message is. It seems to me that the event of ten thousand being thrown out of employment has struck you by its imposing vastness; that you have felt as you ought to feel the immense importance of the crisis; but that you have concluded as you ought not to conclude, that, because it is vast and important, therefore we should be in a hurry to proclaim our conclusions upon it, or should decide that it must be meant to give us an opportunity of announcing broadly and nakedly what we believe to be the remedy for the evil.

‘This may be a call of God ; it may be a temptation of the devil, it may be—I am satisfied it is, both. I wish, therefore, to see how we may obey the call, and resist the temptation, and when I am trying to do so, I cannot be merely talked down by being told that I am afraid of my own shadow—when possibly it is not that, but the shadows of ten thousand gaunt and starving men, with their wives and children, that I am afraid of, or what is to me scarcely less terrible, the shadow of the principle of co-operation exchanged for its substance. I am obliged to speak much more determinately, authoritatively and insolently than I have any liking to do, specially when Louis and Furnivall are present, because I must make them understand that it is not folly or cowardice at times to sit still, and that they are not absolute judges a priori what are and are not those times.

A little boy whose elder brother had set him up on a great heap of stools to act Gamaliel, while he sat at his feet as Paul, when the stools came down, and he fell on his head, cried out, “I won’t be ‘Maliel any more.” I have often made the same resolution, having as little right as the little boy to my insecure position, and tumbling as awkwardly. But, as long as you choose to pretend that I am, for my office sake, in any sense a Gamaliel to any of those who I trust will some day be almost as unlike me as Paul was to his master, so long I must take my chance of being considered an obstructive, of being charged with flying from my shadow, of being thought to be under evil influence, of being suspected of aiming to stop, or make obstructions, to the movement in which I have taken part. Such experiences are not new ; often those who have to pass through them deserve much heavier accusations, and need them. I am sure I am not an exception.’

Also to Mr. Ludlow.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘1852.

‘I have not been urging the amalgamated iron trades to an unconditional surrender. I have not seen Newton, or any one who represents their interests. What I said to the council was that I believed an unconditional surrender might be the right way of showing the brute force there was in capital, and of bringing the case of the working-men fairly before the public, as a struggle of human beings against mere money power.

‘But I will not ask the men to starve, unless I can starve with them. I will not put the cause of association in hazard by pressing it upon them as a remedy, when they may not have the means of making it a remedy. I will not deceive them by false promises and hopes, and call upon them for sacrifices, which they may not be morally or physically able to make. I am certain that I am right in this: we have an awful responsibility as counsellors of the working-men, and as defenders of the principle of association. I will not give up a real good for a seeming one. I did not suppose the iron-workers could be induced, or ought to be induced under present circumstances, to surrender; but I did think, that that alternative might be set before them, in quite a different way from that in which it has been presented to them hitherto, not as an escape from what is right, but as a way of enforcing it. Of course, I know that what I said had a sound of compromise in it. I don’t care a fig for sounds. I did not mean compromise, but the very reverse of it. I did not mean the dereliction of a principle, but the assertion of one.’

‘P.S.—Newton, I understand, meant to propose a course at the meeting to-day which was much better than mine. He was ready to give up circulars, or any point of honour, if the masters will concede, as the Times said they would, the principle for which they are contending.’

It will, perhaps, illustrate my father’s view expressed in the foregoing letter, if I mention that he used often to refer to the trial of Hampden during the civil wars, as the all important point in determining for the time the national feeling on the subject of the king’s government, because Hampden was condemned. He always maintained that the conviction was by this means forced home upon the national conscience, that the law courts could not be depended on to enforce justice and ancient law, because power lay with the king to override them: and thus the law-abiding sense of the nation was driven over to the side opposed to the king. Now, such an instance as this was in my father's mind an historical lesson, which he, the student of the great Educator, felt bound to accept, and would often apply. I cannot give proof for my assertion; but I am convinced that it was present to his mind on this occasion.

'Fraser's Magazine' for January, 1852, contained an attack, not specially severe, upon the 'Christian Socialists.' Mr. Kingsley was at the time contributing successive portions of 'Hypatia' to Fraser. To these facts the next letter refers.

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'February 7, 1852.

'Hughes has shown me your letter to the editor of 'Fraser.' I do not think you ought to send it. So far as I can interpret the code, or the unwritten law, of magazine ethics, no easy task I admit, there is no obligation in one contributor to respect the faith of another, nor any call for one whose faith has been maligned to strike work in consequence. What I think you have the right, and, which is perhaps more to the purpose in any questions relating to the press, the power to do is, to insist upon John Parker or the editor, whoever he may be, inserting an article of yours (to be signed, if you will follow my recommendation, not C. Kingsley, but "A Christian Socialist"), stating very quietly, temperately, and decisively, the real faith which we profess, why it is Conservative and not destructive, why it is necessary for the present crisis, what we have and have not to do with the Inquirer.* Such a paper, written as you could write it, would be valuable to us just now in many ways—as a lecture to friends as well as enemies, as a sotto voce hint to Louis and Ludlow, no less than an open admonition to the Times, Chronicle,

* Which newspaper had attacked the Christian Socialists; ergo 'Fraser' had assumed, that there must be some leaning towards the sceptical views of the Inquirer, among the Christian Socialists; just as Dr. Jelf had, on similar grounds, made the assumption that they agreed with Mr. Holyoake.

- ‘Fraser,’ &c. I am very thankful that the imprudent garrulity of Fraser’s man has laid him open to this infliction, and fixes you as the person to administer it. We might never have had such a chance anywhere but for this very bearable and on the whole convenient kick. ‘Hypatia’ seems to me very powerful, and in general true. The world has become very undramatic, and will therefore, of course, mistake your meaning, and give you credit for what you do not mean.
- ‘Do not tread needlessly on any one’s toes; and sometimes sacrifice a tempting description, that you may avoid the reputation of being voluptuous, which will hinder people from doing you justice. I do not recommend you ever to make any real sacrifice to prudence of dramatical truth, for I believe the age needs it. One character I miss which seems necessary to complete the picture of the age, an earnest Latin, not of Italy, but probably with a mixture of African blood.
- ‘Read Augustine’s ‘Confessions’ again, note their entire contrast with the modern methodistical confessions: the confession of God is always in him, and the search after Him.’

‘MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

‘February 11, 1852.

- ‘You will not arrive at the differentia of the Latin merely from the ‘Confessions,’ important as they are. If you have time to take a glance at the De Civitate Dei, especially the metaphysical parts of it (that on the homo secundum Deum and the homo secundum hominem taught me more than all the metaphysical books I ever came in contact with, and threw back a wonderful light on Plato), you will, I think, discover, far better than I can tell you, wherein the Latin excelled the Greek, and was the witness and prophet of a regenerate social order for the universe, not merely, which is the best that can be said of Cyril or of Chrysostom, a brave antagonist, as a regenerate individual man, of a detestable social system. The real strength of Augustine was acquired, I conceive, through his early baptism in the Styx of Manichæanism, and his discovery that God must be the deliverer from it. I do not say that he ever shook off the distemper ; it came back again frequently in his battle with Pelagius, and I think also with the Donatists, to whose real conviction I should suppose he never did justice, but was content to produce an unsatisfactory exposition of the parable of the good and bad fish against them. Nevertheless, he did learn and believe inwardly, however he might waver, that the world which God has made must be good. And therefore he had to believe also that there is an order at the bottom of it, and that this may and must vindicate itself some day. This inward persuasion belonged, as I hold, to Augustine quâ Latin, though it was rooted in him by peculiar experiences, and was affected, on the whole not expanded or improved, by his African birth and education. And therefore the Latin mind could meet the Gothic and combine with it, while the Greek regarded it as merely uncouth and frightful. The reverence for women and the dream of a domestic life, however alien from the existing condition of the Western Empire, were capable of assimilating with those older parts of the Latin character which the Christian Church educated and again made mighty. From this union I need not tell you the modern West has been born, and a very glorious birth I hold it to be, though the child may have passed through rickets, croup, scarlet fever, and every other disease to which flesh is heir, and many to which spirit is heir, after it went to school and since it has been stalking about as a full grown gentleman. The love of order and concentration in the Latin may have given birth to popedoms, empires, military despotisms, without end ; the savage old Goth may have had his independence, private judgment, Germanic conceits, and all the rest of it ; but the two together make something better than has yet been, though, I trust, to be hammered into Greek and Jew in the days which are to be. Now what strikes me is, that as you have different Greek and Jew specimens of the expiring world, you ought not only to have a Gothic specimen of the new world. Merely as a lively contrast to Alexandrian civilisation and corruption he may be sufficient, not as a complete picture of the elements out of which God would make a Christendom. But though I speak decisively, I have a very strong secret opinion that you know infinitely more about the laws of dramatic art, and the demands of your own subject, than I do, and I should be sorry if I tempted you to put any figure upon the canvas, which would disturb the grouping of those which are there already.'

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'February 21, 1852.

'Parker has sent me the letter. I quite approve of the publication, and so does Hughes upon my representation of its contents: he has not yet read it. I think it may do much good. But I made a stupid blunder when you returned the two sheets on Monday.

'Thinking one was only my own nonsense which you had copied, with improvements, I burnt that one in a great hurry and found to my horror that the next sheet did not connect with the previous one. As I knew it was important that Parker should have it that day, I wrote in two or three sentences which I think made the whole good sense, and were in the spirit of those which I recollected. Still it is hardly fair to you that you should not have your own say. Shall I send back the MSS. to be filled up? There cannot be much omitted, but I will send it you if you please on Monday, or else give it at once to a printer, and send you the proofs, in which you can make alterations if you find them necessary. Will you describe it (I like the first title very much), "A Letter to 'Fraser's Magazine' in Answer, &c.," or how otherwise? However, you can settle that by-and-by.

'I wish you were in London. I am very anxious about the next step of the engineers. They purpose to call a meeting of all the trade societies to ask for their help and sympathy. They asked me, through Hughes, to preside. I said that if I had a case to go with, I would at once call on the Bishop of London and ask him what he would like me to do, but that I did not think I had a case; that it seemed to me too much like throwing away the scabbard, and proclaiming that the war with capitalists was begun. Neale thought that they might change the meeting into one for a petition to the legislature asking them to support their own law, permitting combinations, against the determination of the masters to make it nugatory.

• I saw Newton yesterday and told him that this was the suggestion of the council. He gave, I think, very good reasons why that would be a hopeless course, and might lead the House to repeal, or at least restrict the law, instead of enlarging it; but I was not convinced by his arguments in favour of the meeting, though they were able and such as gave me a very favourable opinion of his sense. Especially I urged him not to bring forward the plan of a great bank for co-operation, without the most careful consideration of the principle and the details.

‘I am sure the men are gaining ground now through the wildness of the masters, but a false move may be ruinous. Tell me what your opinion is. I want to get at the clergy and see if they can do anything. Hughes had agreed to go with me to the Bishop of Oxford. Your letter may do much good in this way; but it should be a pamphlet to the upper classes, not a tract for the lower.’

It would appear, however, that ultimately Parker declined to publish the letter, for it bears on its title-page the names of E. Lumley and J. J. Bezer, the latter a man who had been set up as a publisher by the promoters, no living publisher venturing to commit himself to the risk of publishing, in the teeth of the storm of public opinion, either the Christian Socialist or the ‘Tracts on Christian Socialism.’ The title adopted by Mr. Kingsley for his letter was, “Who are the Friends of Order? A reply to certain observations in a late number of ‘Fraser’s Magazine.’”

The conferences with working-men which had taken place in 1849 had, on the setting up of the various associations, gradually merged in the conferences between the promoters and associates. At first, whilst all the questions connected with association were new, it had been more convenient to discuss them among those who were interested in them. But as soon as these had been pretty thoroughly threshed out, the association conferences lost their interest, and became concerned with mere matters of business, in which my father, at all events, felt that he was not engaged in his proper work. But very many, both of his friends and of the working-men who had not joined them, had been very much interested in the more general conferences. A strong wish was expressed for their revival, and accordingly due notice was given that on the 10th of March, 1852, the conferences would be resumed in the cutters' room of the Tailors' Association at 34, Castle Street. A "Hall of Association" was in course of being built, but the only conferences of which any record survives took place before it was finished. The meetings were held on alternate Wednesdays. My father presided at all of them. The first was a purely preliminary meeting. A subject was proposed for the next—"What are the relations which should exist between capital and labour?"

No such conference took place. The discussion was set aside at my father's instance because he disliked discussions on "capital," "labour"; wishing instead for discussions on men, their duties and relationships. The first meeting was on the subject of "Trades-unions, their effects on the condition of the working classes in past times, and their probable future as connected with the co-operative movement." It had not taken place when the following letter was written, but the subject for the meeting had been announced. He had given two lectures at the Greenwich Literary and Scientific Institute on Co-operation.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

'March 21, 1852.

'I thank you very heartily for your letter. I do not think I can at present make my feelings respecting Christian Socialism intelligible to you. But I am glad you have read my Greenwich lectures (there is not to be a third), because I have expressed in them, not clearly, but more clearly than elsewhere, what is the ground upon which I stand myself, and upon which I believe we must all stand. So long as it is a question between capital and labour, I am satisfied there will be endless controversies. You will take one side, Neale another, Le Chevalier a third. You will all feel that you are supporting a principle; you will be very apt to give that principle an exaggerated, exclusive, distorted character. For you will not be clear whether you are supporting a new and juster arrangement of things, or whether you are contending for the rights and relations of persons. What I have tried to say in the lectures is that the reorganisers of society and the conservators of society are at war because they start from the same vicious premisses; because they tacitly assume land, goods, money, labour, some subjects of possession, to be the basis of society, and therefore wish to begin by changing or maintaining the conditions of that possession; whereas, the true radical reform and radical conservation must go much deeper and say: "Human relations not only should lie, but do lie beneath all these, and when you substitute—upon one pretext or another—property relations for these, you destroy our English life and English constitution, you introduce hopeless anarchy."

'Of course we have all said this in a hundred ways; but we have not, it seems to me, said it distinctly and emphatically enough. We have tampered with the foreign Socialism, saying it would be good if Christianity were at the basis of it. We have tampered with the English capitalism, saying "Lord Derby and his followers—Cobden and his followers—would be right if only they respected the working-men's interests as well as those of the upper class, of the middle class." We have not said, "The Foreign Socialism is good, just because it is a tremendous protest against an abuse of the first laws of human society, which must be stopped, and Christianity can only set it right by striking at that foundation. The English capitalism is only good so far as it affirms the veritable existence of a right and true order; it is false, utterly false, in its theory of what that order is, and so far from wishing to see it extending its lines that it may comprehend the working classes on their behalf and our own we denounce any such extension. We say that the working classes exist to assert the dignity of man, and to be witnesses against that glorification of things which has destroyed the other two." Everything, it seems to me, depends upon the clearness with which we see this to be the issue to which all social struggles are tending, and upon the decision and moderation with which we assert it to be so.

I do not wonder if the world takes less interest in us than it did a year ago. I am glad if it does. The world has never understood what we are about, because we have not understood it. I feared the Christian Socialist Journal because I feared it would embarrass the question more; strongly asserting the religious principle, being very busy with the commercial details; leaving the public in doubt whether we were pressing a commercial scheme upon religious maxims, or introducing a new religion into commerce.

The evident disagreement of the persons concerned in the work on these fundamental points embarrassed its readers more. I did prefer, as you say rightly, that it should become merely commercial, just that it might not lead anyone to fancy that Christianity or politics were commercial.

For the same reason I opposed your motion for bringing the agency under the control of the council of promoters, and was eager that it should work out its own problem in its own way. I may have been right or wrong, but I have, more or less distinctly, kept that object always before me.

To set trade and commerce right we must find some ground, not for them, but for those who are concerned in them, for men to stand upon. That is my formula. I do not wish pedantically to obtrude it, or to make it contract other people's work, but it has more and more presented itself to me as the one to which all our failures, oppositions, feeblenesses, are driving us.

I resume the conferences solely in hopes of getting that acknowledged by the working-men; I would have resumed the 'Politics for the People' precisely for the same purpose. If we are to be teaching by books and lectures, I would try to give them that shape and character. It is for this end I would support a slop-working tailors' association. I will stand by the engineers just as far as this is their end; and just so far as I see they have mere commercial ends however respectable, I will leave them to fight their own battles as they may.

'You know now my creed of association and my scheme of policy. I cannot say how earnestly I should wish you to act with me in it, or how painful it is to me to be at variance with you about anything. But from this line I mean, with God's help, not to swerve, though I will gladly work with any person who seems to me aiming at right, even if I cannot adopt his maxims, nor he mine.'

The reports of the conferences which are given in the Journal of Association are so brief that it is very difficult to find in the records of the speeches in which my father summed up the discussions, any sentence which can be recognised as his own. In several instances, however, the report represents faithfully the line he took, and it is often very characteristic of him. The Conference on trades-unions took place on April 21, 1852.

"The President, in summing up, recapitulated the charges which had been made by the opener and other speakers against the trades-unions, and the manner in which these charges had been met. The result which all that he had heard left upon his mind was, that this was only part of a much larger question, one which involved the relations of labourers with one another, and with capitalists as well as labourers. Trades-unions had been called aristocratic societies. He thought that that description of them was true. But he thought that their exclusiveness, though it might be made the pretext for all sorts of selfishness, was not essentially a bad one. He admitted the equality in which men should stand to one another; but then they must be truly men, something more than mere animals following blindly the animal instincts of their nature. You could not put the latter on an equality with thoughtful, self-denying men. He could not, therefore, agree with Mr. Hughes that because they were exclusive they were essentially bad. That exclusiveness might rest on false grounds; if so, they would be surely punished for it. He urged those who felt that they were men to bear in mind that others had the same capacities with themselves, and that they should endeavour all they could to make those, whom they found themselves obliged to exclude, better men, and to bring them into fellowship. Mr. Jones had asked the question, was it fair to demand of working-men that they should exhibit qualities which we did not find in any other class of society, which we did not practise ourselves? He would say 'no.' Such a demand was monstrously unfair. But he thought there was another way of looking at the matter. They might say to working-men, and he thought it would be kind to say to them: We have been selfish, we have been exclusive, and we have suffered in consequence of being so. Now do you benefit by our experience. Only in that sense could he call upon working-men to be better than other men. He would say to the members of trades-unions, if you have the principles of fellowship at heart, you must diffuse them as widely as possible, and thus convert the union into an association."

To Mr. Mansfield on his leaving England for Paraguay.

'MY DEAR MANSFIELD,

'May 8, 1852.

'I did not know of your plan. Ludlow said something to me about it, but I understood him that you had abandoned it. May God bless you in it, and bring you back to be as useful, as I am sure He means you to be, in your own land!

'I shall miss you very much; more than you would easily believe, seeing I have done so little to help you, and to show that I had some interest in your troubles and in your works. May we all be drawn much more closely to each other in spirit, and be rid of all the wrong which keeps us asunder. I have much to confess, and much to repent of, before that prayer will be granted me.'

The question "What should be the conduct of Co-operators in the present state of the affairs of the country" was debated in a conference on May 5, and again on May 19, on which occasion the chairman (F. D. M.), in summing up, said, "he felt bound to state that he entirely disagreed with a statement put forth by more than one speaker during the two evenings that the discussion had lasted, that we are to put forward a certain set of measures to which we are to require candidates to pledge themselves. However excellent those measures might be in themselves, or however fully he might agree with them, the doctrine of 'measures, not men' was one which he must protest against with all his might. It was one which led to great practical dishonesty. Constituents were deceived by candidates, and it was inevitable that they should be. Young men were sent into Parliament, pledged to particular measures—growing men, acquiring wisdom, gaining experience, and who, as a consequence, were often compelled to change their opinions upon the very measures to which they stood pledged. What they wanted was not men tied down to certain measures, but above all things men of principle. The impression which the discussion had left upon his mind was, that there was one principle which they were bound to maintain; that a man was worth more than a thing. The object which he would propose to himself to find out if possible in voting for a member of Parliament would be this:—is this a man who sets up money as the supreme thing; or does he regard man as being of higher importance than any of the things by which he is surrounded? In the tests by which he might seek to find this out, he might be deceived again and again, but that would be his aim. He would rather vote for a man who agreed with him on this principle, though dissenting from every one of his measures, than for a man who agreed with all his measures, but who did not recognise that principle. And in the next place, he would wish him to be a man of common sense, who would understand the means by which the objects he sought to attain could be best carried out. He would have members go to Parliament unfettered, believing that they would ultimately come to the right conclusion. At all events, that appeared to him the safe course, and the only safe course to pursue. This he thought would reconcile the views of different speakers. On the one hand, it seemed reasonable that, having a definite principle, they should make all other questions subordinate to that; and on the other hand, that they should interest themselves in the various important public questions that were brought forward. He did not shrink from any application of the doctrine he had laid down. One speaker, for instance, considered it necessary to pull down the church of which he was a minister. He would say to him, Certainly, by all means pull it down if you can; if it has a basis in the nature of things, you will not succeed. It must have something to stand on, or it will not stand. He believed that it had something to stand on, that it was here to teach men what he had just been telling them—to teach man the dignity of his nature, to raise him out of all bondage, so that things might not exercise a lordship over him." No more characteristic speech than this could have been delivered on a political subject by him. It has evidently been much spoilt in the reporting; but this wish to make members of Parliament "representatives, not delegates," to keep Parliament a real consultative assembly; this sense of the moral iniquity of the attempt to bind members by pledges; and of the moral wrong done by members who make their way into Parliament by swallowing pledges, was one of the strongest faiths of his life. He was never tired of referring to Burke's speeches at Bristol on the 3rd of November, 1774, and that previous to the election in 1780 as the grandest of political deliverances. He believed the moral ground taken in them to be impregnable.

Soon after Mr. Slaney's Committee had reported in 1850, Mr. Labouchere, the Home Secretary of Lord Russell's Government, had requested Mr. Ludlow to draft a Bill which should legalise the co-operative associations. On seeing the draft Mr. Labouchere seems to have been alarmed by finding that the change in the law would be more serious than he had expected, and whilst expressing friendliness had postponed action.

On February 20, 1851, Mr. Slaney obtained a new Committee "to consider the law of Partnership, and the expediency of facilitating the limitation of liability, with a view to encourage useful enterprise, and the additional employment of labour."

On February 17, 1852, Mr. Slaney again brought forward the question, expressly referring to the co-operative societies, and to the evidence which his Committee had received on the subject. In reply, Mr. Labouchere promised a Commission to inquire into the law of partnership. A few days afterwards the Conservatives replaced the Liberals in office.

The delay had been largely due to the fact that the working-men had been trained for years by agitators to distrust all government; * the living generation of them had only within the few years since 1848 been brought into actual contact with men, who, not for the purpose of party political ends, were seeking to remedy their practical difficulties; every effort had been strained by the press to induce them to distrust these men: moreover, a certain shyness of what to them was new and strange prevented them from following the advice of the promoters to join in orderly petitions through the several members for their towns and counties. The only form of petition to which they had been trained by the agitators was a mass petition, intended to terrorise by an exhibition of physical force. Petitions depending for their effect on the honest setting forth of a practical grievance on a specific subject, and assuming the honest desire of the House to put them right,

* I am only recording, almost entirely from contemporary evidence, the influences which actually affected the conduct of the men at this time, and that conduct as it actually was. I am most anxious not to discredit many other efforts, with which this history is not concerned. But the shortness of men's memory as to past services is sometimes startling. In the International Trade Conference in Paris on October 29, 1883, an English representative, Mr. Burnett, "pointed to the example of England as conclusive" against anything being ever done, by any but working-men, to regulate the employment of women and children. "There all had been done by the organisation of the men themselves." Such is the remembrance of all Lord Shaftesbury's services! It is not therefore surprising, that, at this time, the promoters had practically to deal with men who acted as if all outside their own ranks had till then been enemies.

were an altogether new and untried thing. Hence the most earnest appeals of the promoters to the men, to adopt the only course that would ensure the early passing of a bill, met with no response at all corresponding to the actual strength of the feeling among the body of working-men. The Liberal Government had been afraid of many of their supporters, and had been glad enough to shirk the question.

Nevertheless, thanks to the nature of the evidence produced before Mr. Slaney's committees, and the vigorous pressure brought to bear by the promoters on individual members, from whom amidst the storm of newspaper misrepresentation, they never met with a single rebuff when the rights of the case had been fairly set forth, the question was silently making way. When in February 1852, Lord Derby's government came into power, the Bill was promised the support of the Ministry, and being brought in as a private measure, under the title of the "Industrial and Provident Partnerships Bill," by Messrs. Slaney, Tufnell and Sotheron, two of them Liberals, the latter a Conservative, it was by the 11th June read a third time in the House of Lords and passed.

Mr. Ludlow had been engaged in drafting the charter for Queen's College, and in doing so, protested to my father against the self-denying ordinance by which the professors were transferring the government of the college, till then vested in their hands, to an independent council.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

'Summer, 1852.

'I did not write to you till I had seen the bill and got the charter. I heartily agree with all you say on the first point, and am rejoiced that you should say and feel it. If God puts it into our hands, let us rejoice with all thankfulness, and ask to be taught how we may work in it with all zeal and union. I hope not to shirk any task which He lays upon me, though I believe I have scattered the few hints which I had to scatter, and that silence would often be most fitting for me on that and most other subjects.

'There is much in what you say about Queen's College; but the exceeding awkwardness and difficulty of judging each other has decided the professors to desire that all jurisdiction should be vested in the council; they retaining the really practical power of teaching, and whatever appertains to it. I think, indeed I know, there are possible and probable evils in such a self-denying ordinance, but on the whole they seem to me less than those from which we are suffering at present. The bishop would be very glad to have a principal, and that would perhaps be the best course, but the committee of education have a kind delicacy about suspending me in my office of chairman, and, with the present feeling about me in various quarters, I would never consent to be anything else."

'Ely Cottage, Lee Road, Blackheath,

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'July 12, 1852.

'I have thought often of your 'Perseus,' and shall delight to see it in full glory. I want to talk with you some time or other about a way in which it seems to me possible to gratify safely Ludlow's and Louis' desire for a periodical. The present state of parties seems to me to demand, some way or other, a work which shall honestly and deliberately set itself to do what you have declared in your letter on Order to be the function of the Christian Socialist. Hitherto we have been mere Ishmaelites, not only by position but too much in spirit. We shall be much stronger, and be much more terrible to the oppressors and dividers of the world, if we resolutely undertake the office of reconcilers: reconciliation being, as I believe, the destruction of compromise. Our kindest love to Mrs. Kingsley and the three children; the youngest may receive it in some concrete shape; it is in the blessed state of not comprehending abstractions.'

The "dialogue" which the following letters discuss was that afterwards published as 'Phaethon; or Loose Thoughts for Loose Thinkers.' No others of the intended series appeared.

'Blackaller's Lodgings, Littlehampton,

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'August 6, 1852.

'I only got your "dialogue" last night. I am on my way to Hurstmonceaux, and I hope by scribbling these lines in a little pot-house by the station, I may save the Brighton post. Georgina has tried to say what she felt to Mrs. Kingsley. I must stick to business.

'I think Macmillan, when he has read your "dialogue," which I will take care shall be packed—if it needed such commendations—with all high words from Hare and me, would publish the dialogue with or without your name, and would give you at once all that a magazine editor would give for it, in hopes that it might be the beginning—though you need not pledge yourself to this, and must not think of it till 'Hypatia' is done—of a series of blows to Chapman and Co., which you might deal out by yourself, and in which I might be bottle-holder. I know you have dark designs of the kind, and Cambridge is just the place for such a fight, certainly the place where a Platonic dialogue would be best understood. May I manage the negotiations?'

To Mr. Daniel Macmillan.

'Blackaller's Lodgings, Littlehampton, Sussex,

'MY DEAR MACMILLAN,

'August 9, 1852.

'I propose to send by the train from this place to-day another batch of my sermons from the 6th to the 20th.* You will find with them another MS., of which I must speak at greater length, as I believe its value is much greater. Before last Easter, Kingsley received a letter from a young man who had been much perplexed by the Chapman doctrines about truth being merely subjective. He wrote off this dialogue, which he read to me about three months ago. I was exceedingly delighted with it. He sent it to me one day last week. The next day I was going over to Hurstmonceaux and I took it with me. Though Hare is in a sadly broken state, hardly able to take an interest in anything, he read it with exceeding delight, and spoke of its great beauty and excellence, both as an imitation of Plato and for its direct purpose. He is the best judge I know on such a subject, and my opinion entirely coincides with his, I think it may be and ought to be one of a series. If the rest were written with anything like the same power and spirit, they would be most valuable agents in the "restoration of belief," and in striking deadly blows at what Kingsley and I agree in feeling to be the plague of this time. I feel this so strongly, and that Cambridge is the place to bring out such a series, and that you would be carrying out all your noblest plans if you commenced it, that I wrote to Kingsley saying I should propose it to you. I send you his answer which came by return of post to-day, which is himself all over. . . .'

* On the "Prophets and Kings of the Old Testament."

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'August 13, 1852.

'I spent a few hours in London to-day, and saw Macmillan, who is there. His brother has read the dialogue, and is much delighted with it. He only objects for business reasons to its shortness, and as to whether it could not be somehow introduced by or into a story—I suppose in the kind of setting which Tennyson has devised for some of his gems, and which is often as perfect as the gem itself, or like Christopher Sly and the 'Taming of the Shrew.'

'A modern envelopment might explain the transition from Athens to Cambridge or Edinburgh, which you contemplate.'

To Miss Priscilla Maurice.

'Prees, Salop, September 1, 1852.

' . . . I waited till I got into these friendly quarters to thank you for your very kind letter, and for the present you design for me.

'Your letter was very welcome indeed. It told me at least what I ought to have been and to be; very little what I have been and am. I am afraid I have watched very little as one who is to give account. I have a very strong feeling of the duty of testifying for the name and kingdom of God; a very deep conviction that Protestants and Romanists alike are setting up a religion in place of God, and are often shamefully maligning Him. I feel that if ever I do the work which I am sent into the world to do, I must more earnestly call upon the Church to believe in God the Father, the Son and the Spirit, and not to confound Him with the Evil Spirit. If I did this faithfully and heartily, I should think that I was labouring for the salvation of individual souls, and of the whole Church and of mankind. But the feebleness and insincerity of my witness in words and life often appal me, and would make me despair if I were not thoroughly convinced that God is His own witness, and He will use us when His good time comes, and that we are to wait for it, and believe that in spite of all that one is and is not.'

To Rev. M. and Mrs. Maurice.

'Prees, Shrewsbury, September 2, 1852.

'MY DEAREST FATHER AND MOTHER,

'I rejoice that God permits me once more to write to you on this day, and to desire that it may yet return with the same mercies and pledge of blessings to us all. I am sure that the repetition of such days is an ever renewed token that He is with us seeking our good, and desiring to bind us in closer bonds to Himself and to each other. All union is, I am certain, of Him; everything that breaks it, and mars it, of ourselves. I have need every day to confess how much I have set at naught and trifled with the blessed ties by which He has knit me to dear friends and relations; sometimes the thought is appalling. But above all, and beneath all, is the sense of a reconciling love which is stronger than all one's selfishness, and which will overcome it at last. . . .'

The circumstances to which the next letters to Mr. Ludlow refer will best be told in the words of a letter from Mr. Hughes. It is necessary to explain that the pamphlet by the then Lord Goderich, which probably differed somewhat in its printed form from that which it had taken in manuscript, is in its printed form a strong assertion of democracy as the great fact of the age, and of "the duty of the age" to recognise this, to help it forward and to bring the democracy into accord with the government of Christ. The writer expressly calls himself a "democrat" and urges the working-men, whom he more expressly addresses, to strive by all honest means for universal suffrage and to make themselves worthy of it.

It will perhaps be well also to premise that my father at all times considered it to be the duty of statesmen to look forward with hope to the time when all men should be fit to take their own place in the Commonwealth, and a further duty to do their utmost to help forward such a time, but he looked upon it as equally their duty to endeavour not to admit men to the franchise before they were fit for it. It is not, however, to suffrage questions that the letters directly refer.

Letter from Mr. T. Hughes.

'As you know, the "Tracts by Christian Socialists" were coming out, under the care of a publishing committee on which were Ludlow, I, and Kingsley—I forget whether any one else, but with your father as supreme authority, no tract being published without his sanction.

'Well, this being so, Goderich (as he then was) sent me the MS. of his 'Duty of the Age.' I was the only one in town, and, unless I am much mistaken, your father was out of England. At any rate I didn't know where to get at him. So I sent the tract down to Kingsley and received it back with a perfect song of triumph, that a young lord should at last have taken his place frankly in the front line of the people's army, &c., &c. Without waiting for your father's sanction, I sent the MS. to be printed by Bezer, the one-eyed Chartist costermonger whom we—Heaven save the mark!—had set up as our publisher! Goderich consented to bear the extra expense, so I ordered it to be printed on good paper, with ample margin (see copy by this book post), and put upon the title-page my two favourite quotations, and we all thought millennium was a coming with a wet sail!

'When lo! and behold your father turns up, and I, in gayness of heart, wrote to obtain his sanction to publication, just as a matter of form! I got in reply a precious wiggling (the only one I ever had) with orders to suppress the whole edition, and it was consequently carried ignominiously up to my chambers in Old Square by Monoψ (as we used to call the one-eyed Chartist), and there remained for years until, on moving, I sent it to Lord Ripon's (some dozen huge square brown-paper packages), where it remains, I take it, to this day. I kept, however, some few copies, one of which I send you by book post, as it is a sort of literary curiosity; never having been entered at Stationers' Hall.

'But what I want to impress on you is that this is the most crucial test of your father's pluck, more so a great deal than the central agency business, for every man of us was against him. It was a perfect thunderbolt when your father came down with his peremptory veto. On every other occasion, as on the agency business, he had a strong minority, at any rate, on his side; but in this not a man, so far as I remember. However, he had his way, as you see—and on the whole I think a very good job too.'

Mr. Ludlow doubts if so many of the council read the pamphlet as Mr. Hughes supposes to have seen it. He did not himself know who the author was till after he had read and approved it.

To Mr. Ludlow.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

'September, 1852.

'I submit thankfully, or, at least, I wish to do so, to any reproof you may administer. I have perhaps too quickly forgotten the letter and all about it, for I at once explained to Lord Goderich why I had written it, and how certainly I should not have written it, if I had not had the fullest confidence in his honesty and manliness. I have never received so many proofs of kindness and trust from him as since he saw it; if any annoyance remains in his mind, I am much grieved.

‘But I do not think there can be. I did not recollect that I had mentioned you in the letter. I might have said—I daresay I did—that I wished you to see it, because though I have no hope of being understood by people generally, I am anxious not to be misunderstood by those with whom I am acting, and especially not to get credit with them for agreement when I see things differently. It is quite unnecessary to enter into the general question. I have often explained to you that monarchy with me is a starting-point, and that I look upon Socialism as historically developed out of it, not absorbing it into itself. You, as far as I see, begin with democracy, and develop something like a monarchy out of it. The difference is one of method; and differences of method are to me very practical and important. But I do not want to convert you; I only want you to see whereabouts I am standing. I did speak vehemently to Lord Goderich, as I should not speak to Walter Cooper, because I hold it a primary article of faith that every Christian man should hold the ground God has given him. How intensely that is my conviction I cannot easily explain.’

‘Rodington Rectory, Shrewsbury. September 8, 1852.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

* * * * *

‘Anent democracy—I did not mean, and I certainly expressed myself very blunderingly if I left the impression on your mind that I meant, to denounce that which bears that name in your mind or even in Lord Goderich’s.

‘I said expressly in my letter to him that Socialism—or the acknowledgment of brotherhood in heart and fellowship in work, seemed to me the thing which you were aiming at, the special craving of this time; the necessary fulfilment of the principle of the Gospel. What I complained of was that you had given this truth a bad name, which bad name is much better restricted to a bad thing which certainly does exist, and of which Christian Socialism is I believe the legitimate and appointed cure. I cannot get rid of the feeling that whenever you use the word democracy you fall into an equivoue. Those to whom you speak believe that you wish the people to govern themselves. "Yes," you say, "we do. That is, we wish them to restrain themselves; that is, we wish them to submit to Christ and have Him for their king." Well, but what I wish to know is, do they make Christ their king? Might they choose another if they liked? If not, your democracy is not what other people intend by it, and what they have a right to intend by it. Twist the word as you will, it must imply a right on the part of the people to choose, cashier and depose their rulers. It must imply that power proceeds from them, that it does not find them. Lord Goderich adopts Carlyle as his voucher for democracy; though Carlyle is always raving about the king and hero whom people must obey. You do not swear by him at all. But how can you escape from the endless contradictions and cross purposes in which he is involved—from his recognition of two great truths, that the king is given, and the people is given, and his inability to reconcile them because he does not confess the giver—unless you frankly cast away the phrase which is the plea for all inversion. I do not want to rob you of a single conviction; I want you only to dismiss what sets all your convictions, it seems to me, ajar, and prevents them from bearing, as they ought to do, upon the conscience and heart of the English people. A king given, an aristocracy given, and I can see my way clearly to call upon them to do the work which God has laid upon them; to repent of their sins, to labour that the whole manhood of the country may have a voice, that every member of Christ's body may be indeed a free man. But reconstitute society upon the democratic basis—treat the sovereign and the aristocracy as not intended to rule and guide the land, as only holding their commissions from us—and I anticipate nothing but a most accursed sacerdotal rule or a military despotism, with the great body of the population in either case morally, politically, physically serfs, more than they are at present or ever have been.

‘I admit all you say of my unfitness to govern. But it certainly does not arise from my unbelief in democracy, and would not be corrected if I embraced it. I am naturally by birth, education, everything, a democrat. I have arrived at my convictions about monarchy and aristocracy by sheer force of evidence, reflection on history, belief in God’s revelation. I can prove, as you do, one process by the opposite. But I must begin from the Father if I am to acknowledge the Son; from the head if I am to acknowledge a body, from the one Spirit if I am to see life in the many members. History is to me the most beautiful unfolding of God’s purpose for mankind, amidst all contradictions of human self-will, when I take it as I find it, and do not slip in a theory at the back of the facts; it is a most horrible dissonance, when I look upon all the past as only existing to destroy itself, and to bring forth the many-headed monster in our day.

‘What displeases me most in Lord Goderich’s pamphlet, if it is in print what it was in manuscript, is what offended me years ago in an anti-slavery speech of O’Connell’s. I mean the indignation expressed at the Americans, not because they violate Christ’s Gospel, but because they outrage the principle of democracy, by keeping slaves. What can be so unfair as this mode of speaking? Prove if you like, and if you can, that democracy may exist without slavery. Confute the evidence which leads superficial people like me to doubt if it can; but to take for granted their repugnance, with so many facts in the old world against it, and with the startling phenomenon which the Northern States just as much as the Southern present in modern days (see on that point ‘Uncle Tom’s Cabin,’ passim) does seem to me flagrantly unjust to the people of the United States, and a flagrant outrage upon all fair reasoning. The triumph which the liberated negro, according to Mrs. Stowe, who is evidently an honest and hearty republican, feels when he sets foot on the free soil of Canada, is only an echo of my own deepest convictions that the voice of the deliverer must come as the voice of the king; and that, where you have what is called self-government, and much better and more truly democracy, there you must have a subject race through which the citizen may realise his own stature, and by which he may be admonished—most ineffectually no doubt—of the peril of sinking into mere animalism. Let the true idea of aristocracy as the witness of the lordship of the spirit over the flesh express itself legitimately ; let it have its recognised place in the commonwealth, or it must and will come in illegitimately as a Plutocracy or a Chromatocracy. I stand upon my old English ground. I don't want a Blackstonian balance of powers, a negation of results, any absurd via media in State or Church. But I must have Monarchy, Aristocracy and Socialism, or rather Humanity, recognised as necessary elements and conditions of an organic Christian society. If you keep any one out it will avenge itself fearfully, as Aristotle says the women did in Sparta for the neglect of them by Lycurgus.

‘I know how hard you will find it to stomach these propositions, chiefly because you have so much more political learning than I have, and are so much more up with the times that you cannot go back as I do to what strike you as antiquated constitutional dogmas which we have outgrown. I am in my second babyhood, and am still in my alphabet and primer. I think you will have to begin your elements again, and when you have got them well by heart, all your higher knowledge will be of unspeakable worth to you. I envy it now more than I like to confess ; then I shall not envy it, but shall be most delighted to profit by it, and fill up in some little degree the immense chasms in my information and experience. I do hope that I may be of some little use, not in my own person but in giving a foundation to the minds of some who have materials for building, and a knowledge of order which I am utterly wanting in. That is my vocation. You will find more and more that I can do something when I remember it, and nothing at all when I lose sight of it and try my hand at some work which you, and much less wise men than you, will perform when the time comes, as I hope and believe, famously well. I fear I shall always seem to you only an obstructive, though in my heart and conscience I do not believe that I am one. I would not willingly burn up any of your wood, hay or stubble; but for my task neither that nor your gold and precious stones are of much avail. I am only a digger. God bless you.'

'Rodington Rectory,

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'Saturday, September 11, 1852.

- 'I cannot easily explain to you how much I am cheered and delighted with the prospect which your series of dialogues opens to me. My sympathies are naturally most strong with the epilogue: it expresses so much of what I have felt and have wished to say. But for that very reason I am more suspicious of my own judgment and have determined to be more watchful and exacting.
- 'I almost fear that you will be thought not to have bridged over with sufficient care, for ordinary readers, the passage between dialectics and Catholic faith, which looks to the majority such a hopeless chasm. You have also very naturally, considering the cause you were engaged in, thrown, which is not your usual temptation, an overweight into the High Church scale, and have perhaps made the Evangelical a little too light, at least so it will appear to many over whom you might have a healthful influence. Thirdly, you have scarcely allowed sufficiently for the kind of reaction to which Emersonianism (though it may as you say be descended on the father's side from Calvinism) is owing, against the broad money-getting materialist tendencies of the United States. I should have been disposed, but I leave the hint for your consideration as it may not be so easy to work out, to start from this point; to try to make, perhaps through Templeton, an acknowledgment that he and his school had been dazzled by the vision of a spiritual world suddenly bursting upon them in the midst of the cotton plantations and in the cotton markets, that the discovery of such a spiritual world as having to do with them was likely enough to turn their brains, seeing that all their religious teachers had led them to think that it was intended only for a certain elect class the most alien from them.

‘In this way you might, I think, less offensively connect the new and the old, and it might enable you to develop the two sides of Puritanism, viz. the strong assurance of a divine calling and of God as a personal ruler to which America owes the felling of her trees and the building up of her society: an assurance, it should in all honesty be added, which enabled them to assert a real divine government of the world in opposition to the Laudian government by rope and cope, but which led them to the tyrannical confusion of outward law and inward morality—this first, then secondly the exclusive arrogation to themselves of a property in all invisible and divine treasures. Justice should be done here also to the reality of their convictions, to their actual perception of that which eye hath not seen, though it ended in their mistaking this perception for the thing seen, and so denying it to exist except for them. I am only expanding your own thoughts, but I believe you may expand them with advantage, something in this way.

‘And then it seems to me the transition would be easier both to Templeton’s pathetic and most true statement of his own experience, which I would not alter at all, and to the developement of your own doctrine, both respecting the creeds and dialectics. The creeds assert truths for mankind, truths in themselves, which the Calvinists assert for those who discover them. Templeton and Lady Jane cannot understand one another because she has keener spiritual perceptions and affections than he has, and because her pastors and masters tell her that these perceptions and affections are divinity and that she belongs to a world from which her husband is excluded.

‘She cannot doubt the veracity of her spiritual organs. He sometimes fancies that they belong only to women; sometimes he is tempted to claim his rights in the Emersonian fashion by talking of a great comprehensive humanity, and the like; but his English sense revolts, and he betakes himself to venison and claret. You tell him that what he wants is the truth for humanity, of which these are the counterfeits; that if he finds that, he and his wife will understand each other—she will defer to his guidance and will quicken his sloth. The occupation of dear Mr. Hunt-the-Slipper in teaching a special female Christianity, and preparing ladies for the Romish priest whom he at the same time denounces as the child of the Devil, will be gone, though he may pursue honester and nobler occupations, may assert, against the mere High Church and old English formalist, the reality of spiritual apprehensions and communications, and call Scribes and Pharisees to repentance, without pretending to decry earthly realities of which in practice he makes only too decided an acknowledgment, or actually decrying spiritual realities, the Catholic truths, the truths for every one, which alone prevent the apprehensions and experiences from being mere hysterical emotions. If he will not do that, the Gulf of Emersonianism and Romanism is before him; he must choose one or the other for himself and his disciples. But those who, instead of adopting Proclus and the Neo-Platonists as their guides with Emerson, will take the old Plato and his master to help them in sifting their own words and thoughts, will find in the old Catholic creeds the substitute for all mere decrees of fathers, councils, popes, as well as for all the froth of modern humanitarians. That is my general notion, the object being to make the connection more obvious and felt between the different subjects which are touched in your dialogue, and to make the purpose of dialectics, in the Platonic sense of the word, more intelligible. I should like also that great tenderness both to the old Calvinists and the Lady Janes of the time should accompany the necessary denunciation of their exclusiveness. I almost think I should hold out the subject of baptism, rather as one to be considered hereafter, than give so much prominence to it here.'

‘Rodington, Sunday, September 19, 1852.

‘MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

‘. . . . I was delighted and surprised beyond measure to find your epilogue in proof, and altered more entirely to my mind than I could have imagined possible. . . . To me it was a great satisfaction, for I had many misgivings about my criticisms. I read your MS. to Mrs. Maurice after I had written them, and she was so exceedingly delighted with it, that I began to fancy all female inspiration, for which I have a German reverence, was against me. But I believe she admired the whole for the sake of the part which she was best able to appreciate, and that I desired to see unaltered.

‘About the dialectics I was, perhaps, the best judge, and you have done all, and more than all, I wished, in reference to them. In fact, I can see nothing to amend except certain printers’ blunders, which I have not meddled with. I am rather glad you do not commit yourself, as much as you had, to a panegyric on the American Episcopalians. I have a great respect for them, but without more accurate information I would rather express hopes of what they may do, and assurance of what they can do, than confidence as to the actual. We had two charming days for Beddgelert and Snowdon, which Mrs. Maurice was not well enough to mount.

‘A letter from Ludlow—very interesting, learned, and full of kindness—convinces me how much his constructive and well-furnished mind needs the dialectics you are recommending, but also how much it will be disposed to nauseate them. He complains of me sadly for professing to be merely a digger. He says a Christian ought to build and not to be always looking after foundations, which I doubt.

‘I wish Socrates would explain to some Lacedæmonian how he should think about Brasidas and his death, and that Lady Jane Templeton might be taught that the Bible has not a double standard for judging of departed men—one a secular (the honest belief), one a religious (a conventional)—but would speak of Gideon, or Samson, or Wellington, though none of them immaculate, as having done that which is right in the sight of the Lord, so far as they did anything worthy of our praise.'

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

'The Keble Beau, Shrewsbury,

'September 24, 1852.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

'You treated my anti-democratical heresies with great tenderness, of which I should not have been worthy, if I had really given myself credit for any antiquarian knowledge which I suspected you of wanting. I have little enough of that, as well as of that acquaintance with the present condition of legal, political, and economical science, which I have always envied you for. And that was nearly what I meant by calling myself a digger merely. If I had not been afraid of your mistaking me, I should have given myself the grand title of a theologian, and said that, leaving other spheres of thought and activity to those who were destined for them, and had been furnished with the gifts appropriate to them, I had taken my ground on that one study in which most people would say that I had a professional interest, but which most regard as hopelessly barren. But such a statement would have been misleading, unless I had impressed you with my own deep conviction that theology is not (as the schoolmen have represented it) the climax of all studies, the Corinthian capital of a magnificent edifice, composed of physics, politics, economics, and connecting them as parts of a great system with each other—but is the foundation upon which they all stand. And even that language would have left my meaning open to a very great, almost an entire, misunderstanding, unless I could exchange the name theology for the name God, and say that He Himself is the root from which all human life, and human society, and ultimately, through man, nature itself, are derived. I tried to express all in that one phrase that I was a digger, intending distinctly this, that I fear all economics, politics, physics, are in danger of becoming Atheistic: not when they are worst, but even when they are best; that Mill, Fourier, Humboldt, are more in danger of making a system which shall absolutely exclude God, and suffice without Him, than any less faithful and consistent thinkers—that, just so far as we are chiefly constructive, this danger becomes more imminent and tremendous, that the destructive analysis of the last century is not so alarming as the synthesis of our own.

‘Therefore let people call me merely a philosopher, or merely anything else, or what they will, or what they will not; my business, because I am a theologian, and have no vocation except for theology, is not to build, but to dig, to show that economy and politics (I leave physics to dear Kingsley, who will in that region, and in every other, carry out my hints in a way I could never dream of, and which I admire with trembling, hope, and joy) must have a ground beneath themselves, that society is not to be made anew by arrangements of ours, but is to be regenerated by finding the law and ground of its order and harmony the only secret of its existence in God. This must seem to you an unpractical and unchristian method; to me it is the only one which makes action possible, and Christianity anything more than an artificial religion for the use of believers. I wish very earnestly to be understood on this point, because all my future course must be regulated on this principle, or on no principle at all. The Kingdom of Heaven is to me the great practical existing reality which is to renew the earth and make it a habitation for blessed spirits instead of for demons.

To preach the Gospel of that Kingdom, the fact that it is among us, and is not to be set up at all, is my calling and business. Because I have preached it so uncertainly—like one beating the air—I have had an easy, quiet life; far too much of the good opinion of my friends; merely a few lumps of not hard mud from those who, now and then, suspect that I have hold of something which might make me their mischievous enemy. But if ever I do any good work, and earn any of the hatred, which the godly in Christ Jesus receive, and have a right to, it must be in the way I have indicated, by proclaiming society and humanity to be divine realities, as they stand, not as they may become, and by calling upon the priests, kings, prophets of the world to answer for their sin in having made them unreal by separating them from the living and eternal God who has established them in Christ for His glory.

‘This is what I call digging, this is what I oppose to building. And the more I read the Epistle to the Corinthians, the more I am convinced that this was St. Paul’s work, the one by which he hoped to undermine and to unite the members of the Apollos, Cephas, Pauline, and Christian (for those who said “we are of Christ” were the worst canters and dividers of all) schools. Christ the actual foundation of the universe; not Christ a Messiah to those who received Him and shaped Him according to some notion of theirs; the head of a body, not the teacher of a religion, was the Christ of St. Paul. And such a Christ I desire to preach, and to live in, and die in. Only let us each work in the calling whereto God has called us, and ask Him to teach us what it is, and we shall understand one another and work together.’

CHAPTER IV.

“O, ’tis writ large, the thing I have to do!”—Spanish Gypsy.

HYPATIA AND AUGUSTINE—THE DANGER TO UNITARIANS OF A VIOLENT REACTION—THE SABBATH QUESTION AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE—THE ATHANASIAN CREED—THE ‘PROPHETS AND KINGS’—LETTER INDICATING INTENTION TO GIVE SOON A FULLER EXPRESSION TO HIS THOUGHTS—PRESENT VIEW OF ‘SUBSCRIPTION NO BONDAGE’—MENTIONS TO HIS SISTER A FORTHCOMING BOOK ADDRESSED TO UNITARIANS—THE RECONSTITUTION OF THE FRIENDS OF CO-OPERATORS UNDER THE NEW ACT—HOSTILITY OF POPULAR AGITATORS—CONFLICTING VIEWS.

‘MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

‘Rodington, September 29, 1852.

As a general rule I distrust death-bed stories, and I believe clergymen and medical men, whose experience is more extensive than mine, distrust them more. I do not see any a priori impossibility or even improbability that a man should have felt what the tract writer says the dying father described; the sin is in deducing a doctrine from a morbid and miserable state of mind into which a man could not have come, or at least could not have warned his children of, if the Spirit had deserted him: for who else could put into his heart any concern for their welfare, or could preserve him from wishing that they should share his ruin? A grave and fearful moral might be extracted from such a narrative as to the blindness and darkness into which a man may bring himself respecting God’s will towards him; but, anyhow, it is blindness to a truth which the teacher should have declared to him, instead of accepting and indorsing his falsehood. The wretched attempt to found an argument on the text from Genesis requires no comment, except as it illustrates the common method of first deducing a law from a code of disease and then pretending to discover it in the Bible.

Now as to Raphael and Augustine, I am always afraid of injuring your story by my hints, but such as I have I give them. Suppose Victoria or her father got him in the first place to hear one of Augustine's sermons; the subject is a Psalm. He refines and allegorises without mercy. Nearly all the common sense of David evaporates in mysticism; now and then there is a sentence of pure gold. He puns upon the Latin version; extracts the meaning of a Hebrew from Latin etymologies. This statement, which I purposely exaggerate a little, or rather understate the amount of wheat amidst the chaff to show the impression which this sermon would make on a Jew, you may verify in its general outline by turning to the "Enarratio in Psalmos" almost anywhere. Raphael of course is disgusted; he thinks David is treated by Christian preachers much as Homer was treated by Hypatia; however, it all serves to draw forth a good deal of sound Hebrew feeling which his Neo-Platonism and his subsequent despair had crushed. Next by way of experiment (I suppose it would be possible without any direct profession of a design to be converted; but this you must ascertain from Bingham or Augustine), he goes among the Catechumens to hear a lecture which some young deacon of Hippo is giving. The poor fellow is bungling sadly; he talks about the Creed, quotes texts, produces authorities from this and that father; Raphael thinks the poor swarthy people had better have been left to their old gods. Augustine comes in, listens for a while to this deacon, who becomes rather frightened, bites his lips; he proposes to take the class. The change is magical; in a few moments all eyes are fixed upon the catechist. Out of those same words which had seemed to contain a scheme of religion as hard and exclusive as those which were falling to pieces, he draws the revelation of a God of absolute love, of a Son manifesting this Being and fulfilling His purposes, of a Spirit carrying illumination into the heart, peace into the world. And it is the natural sense of the words! And the Africans confess it and drink it in, clods and brutes as they are, with an intelligence which transfigures their countenances, and raises them into human beings! What did Raphael ever see like it or feel like it at an Alexandrian lecture? It is very different, too, from any old Jewish discourse—different, but, he thinks, not in kind. There is no violent contrast here, such as he felt in the sermon. The God of the Creed might be the God of Abraham. He might be the Lord who was to gather all nations under His yoke. Read “De catechizandis rudibus.” It will justify this part of the picture, I think.

‘The next step is a personal interview; the means of bringing it about, whether it is to be accidental or sought for, I leave to you. Raphael soon finds that he is in the presence of a real man. There may be niaiseries in the opening of their conversation which annoy him; but when they come to close quarters he finds that Augustine knows what evil is, not by the hearing of the ear; that he has had it in him and has wrestled with it to the death. He knows it too in its palpable outward forms. He is altogether practical, and all the controversies of the schools about evil have been translated into facts and realities by his experience. Moreover, Raphael perceives, to his wonder, that he knows God, not by the hearing of the ear. No Neo-Platonist ever could speak of God near him, within him, more than he does, but not as a fine conception, a beautiful dream, into which he is some day to be absorbed. This God, in whom he is living and moving, is as personal and substantial as any Hebrew could believe Him to be, the Warrior with Evil, the Conqueror of it, the Being in whom the Spirit of Lies wishes men not to believe and trust.

‘This is enough, I think, for the Jew’s conversion so far as Augustine has a share in it. He on his side is not discomfited by finding that his new-born son is not the counterpart of himself. He is thankful to have begotten him in God’s image, not in his own. There is a freedom and toleration in Augustine, quite equal to bear with his heresies on marriage, and with many other great practical differences. The effect of these differences on their subsequent intercourse, I take it, is this: Augustine believes that the City of God, a body wholly separate from the plague city—the ungodly world, which is hastening to destruction—will somehow triumph and establish itself. He knows in whom he has believed; he can commit himself and perhaps the Church of Africa to God, though Boniface has deserted, and the Vandals are approaching. But it is an utterly dark prospect as far as the earth is concerned. The only hope is in keeping oneself as much from meddling with it as possible. One cannot altogether. The Donatists are all wrong that the Church here is to be spotless. Only the true elect members of it are that, and they not altogether; there must be a sifting of the net, and a casting away of the bad fish—then, in some other state of things, all will be right. This does not satisfy Raphael: the City of God, he affirms with Jewish pertinacity, is to subdue this world. He admits that it is a Kingdom of Heaven; that the Jews expected such a kingdom, and that it was not revealed till the Son of God took flesh and overcame death; that the Neo-Platonists are dreaming, and not falsely, of such a kingdom as existing. It is as pure as the Donatists say it is; men are impure for not living as members of it. The earth does not make it impure. Everything on earth is good and is to be claimed by it as good potentially, and to be made actually good. All these coming Gothic and Vandalic triumphs are steps to its triumph. The old tyranny of Rome is to pass away; but oh! beware, Augustine, that a new tyranny, more detestable and accursed, does not spring out of its ruins; a tyranny built upon the attempt to set up a kingdom of Heaven on the earth in the name of Christ, on the denial that Christ has set it up already and that He is the foundation of it.—There is one of the most impertinent interferences with a man's hero on record. But I am not guilty, like Steele, of thrusting in a bit of Sir Roger de Coverley when Addison was away. You have drawn it upon yourself.

‘I hope to be in London on Tuesday. Alfred Tennyson has done me the high honour of asking me to be godfather to his child, who is to be baptized on that day. I accept the office with real thankfulness and fear. It was to please his wife he asked me.’

To Rev. J. Compton, at this time a Unitarian, subsequently in English Orders.

‘21 Queen’s Square, Bloomsbury,

‘MY DEAR SIR,

‘October 7, 1852.

‘I hope you have attributed my silence to the right cause. I only returned home from Shropshire on Tuesday, and I only found your pamphlet and letter at my father’s last night. If I had got it sooner, you would have received my grateful thanks at once.

‘I read the two sermons hastily before I went to bed, and found very much indeed to interest me in them most deeply. You will easily suppose that anything relating to Unitarians or their movements touches me very nearly, even if there were not so much in your present experience with which I can sympathise. I should very much like to talk with you, and correspond with you if you had leisure, on many of the topics you have introduced into your discourses. Perhaps I may be wrong—it is always dangerous to comment on the course which any minds are taking, since the Spirit is no doubt leading them in ways we know not—but I cannot help feeling sometimes as if you and others of those brought up in Unitarianism were striking rather vehemently into the opposite direction to that point from which you started; that, experiencing the deficiency of your former creed in its assertion of a divine Spirit, you have overlooked what I believe I learnt from it and have heartily to thank it for—an acknowledgment of a God whom I was taught to call the Father distinct from ourselves, and very far indeed too distant from us. There was an infinite peril, it seems to me, of making this God a mere God of nature, removed from human sympathies, merely beneficent, not in the highest sense benevolent; but there was also the great truth which developed itself in my mind, through many struggles, and a deep sense of evil, into that which we call—you must forgive me a phrase which you do not like—the Catholic Creed. I felt and feel that, precious and invaluable as the truth is, that the Spirit guides us into truth, the truth exists whether we are guided into it or no, and the Bible seems to me to bring it out from the opposite side; to start from a Revelation of God, and to exhibit Him coming into fellowship with His creatures. I have come strongly to think that the subjective faith of F. Newman and others will never be Catholic though they wish it [to] be, that it will be only a refined individualism, and must terminate in various individual superstitions; that Truth must come to us, not of course visibly or verbally, in order that we may embrace it; that it must come to mankind in order that each man may be the better for it.

‘This is the text of a very long discourse, upon which I must not enter. But your kindness and frankness encouraged me to open it when I ought perhaps only to have thanked you for the suggestions and hopes your note and sermons have supplied me with.’

To Mr. Daniel Macmillan.

‘21 Queen’s Square, October 25, 1852.

‘MY DEAR MACMILLAN,

‘Just now this Sabbath question is much disturbing me. My dear and excellent friend Grove is the secretary of the New Crystal Palace, and is greatly agitated by the violent denunciations of the Evangelical clergy against him and it.

‘They are trimming the pulpits for a regular assault. They command us all to preach against the Palace on peril of our souls. I feel the crisis is a very serious one. My own reverence for the Sabbath would seem to many extreme. I believe England and Scotland would perish if they lost it, or began to regard it as Protestants and Romanists abroad do. But I also see that there is an infinite danger of those very views becoming accepted as orthodox and Scriptural which our Lord struggled with, which drew from Him the anger at their Pharisaic hardness of heart of which St. Mark speaks, and His opposition to which caused the conspiracy against His life. The modern fanaticism will drive hundreds of literary men far from ill-affected to Christianity (such as Thackeray) into positive hatred of Christianity. They will see that we are setting up the new moons and Sabbaths above righteousness and mercy, yet it requires the greatest caution not to trample upon the earnest and truthful feelings to which the pulpit agitators are addressing themselves. The attempt must, I think, be made; and I sometimes have a glimpse of the way in which it ought to be done.'

To Rev. F. Garden on the Death of his Wife.

'MY DEAR GARDEN,

' November 22, 1852.

There is no measuring the sorrow which God has called you to bear. I know that it will not be less deep or terrible because you may have long been expecting it, because God may have sent you merciful warnings and preparations. We do not, cannot, receive them as warnings; it is impossible to believe really that the nearest and dearest part of our own being is going to be severed from it. But it is the unfathomableness of the grief which drives us off from all expedients for allaying it, and sends us to the one source of consolation and sympathy. The belief of a Man who suffers with us becomes then not a theory but a fact; one which we may recognise, though we may feel very little of the joy or satisfaction which it might seem to be full of. For all deep truths must be found out, I think, slowly. They lie beneath all experiences of pleasure or pain. We are to grow with them, and in due time they will work upon us and mould us after their own likeness. May God be with you, and make you know more of Himself than any words can tell; then by degrees we may I hope know also more and more of those we have lost—especially while we are trying to work as they would have had us work. . . .’

On the Athanasian Creed ; to one hesitating to take orders.

‘ 21 Queen’s Square, Bloomsbury, November 23, 1852.

‘ MY DEAR SIR,

- ‘ I began a letter to you long ago, but I was hindered in writing it, and I was very anxious not to reward your kind confidence in me, which I greatly value, by a hasty answer which might have done you harm. I shall do you great harm if anything I say is accepted by you merely as a lull of your scruples. Much as I should wish to see you, and all earnest men who feel they have a vocation for the priesthood, entering into it, I would not for the world be accessory to your taking that step without the clearest, simplest conviction, not that I have said something plausible about your doubts, but that you can, either because they are removed, or because they do not affect you as they did, ask God who sees the heart to send you forth to His work.
- ‘ I have seen so much of the misery of tampering with the conscience, of accepting mere arguments as solutions of difficulties (which often entangle parts of our being far out of the reach of arguments), that I would rather be silent for ever than lead any one I care for to adopt my explanations, as if they were good for anything but as hints which he must meditate on himself.
- ‘ You remember probably a saying of Dr. Arnold’s that the early Church was utterly wrong and foolish in making the nature of God, which is so far out of our reach, the ground of its belief and confession ; whereas some doctrine directly concerning our own human life ought to be the uniting bond. A more plausible statement was never made, nor I think one more directly at variance with experience, reason, and Scripture.
- ‘ Experience shows us that confused and partial notions about God have been the root of all the divisions, superstitions, plagues of the world. Our highest human reason asks for the knowledge of God as the ground of itself—as that which is to deliver us from the notions, conceits and imperfect apprehensions which belong to us as individuals. Scripture is either the gradual unveiling of God, or it is nothing.

‘On the other hand all experience testifies that what Dr. Arnold would call the religious truths that concern our souls are apprehended by us as individuals (e.g. our personal evil, our need of a justifier, the fact of justification), and that whenever they are made the grounds of fellowship they lose their meaning and acquire a new and even false character. Reason says that what refers to each man (as each) cannot be the foundation for humanity to rest upon; Scripture is addressed to nations, to Churches, to man.

‘Here then is my justification of the old Church, or rather of that which the history of the Church shows not to have been its work at all, but the necessity of its existence. Because it was for man, and had a Gospel coming from God to man, its creeds were declarations of His nature; they could be nothing else.

‘Now the key to the life of Athanasius (I am not of course speaking now of the creed which is attributed to him but of the man) is this. He clearly saw that all idolatry lurked in Arianism; that it was a distinct return to creature-worship; that it was the substitution of a pseudo-philosophical dogma for a living God; that it destroyed all basis for union among men. Therefore it was worth while to incur all the misery of seeming to fight for a name and a letter; it was worth while to be banished from his see, to be hated by five-sixths of the Church, to be the enemy of emperors, to be an outcast among men. He was, I do believe, in the truest, simplest sense of the words, one of the most Catholic of men, who would have quarrelled with you about nothing but that which he believed would rob mankind of its greatest treasure.

‘I am not sure that he would have written the creed; perhaps not. Nor in this day ought any one to write such a creed, because he would be conveying a false impression of what he meant. But need that creed convey a false impression to us? Should we not have a more false impression if we were without it? Is it not a false impression which makes us wish to be rid of it? What it teaches me is this: to know God is eternal life; not to know Him is eternal death. That belief thoroughly and heartily entertained, instead of making us uncharitable, would be the very ground and root of our charity. God is the perfect charity. The Father dwelling with the Son in one Spirit is that absolute and eternal love which is the ground of all things, that upon which we may repose our hopes for ourselves and the universe. Take away any part of this full idea; throw me upon some meagre conception of a God—and I fall into idolatry, first into the worship of an evil spirit—a mere selfish being at last. This is what I regard with such infinite horror; this is the abyss which I see, not at the feet of some Arian or Unitarian, but at my own; this is what I warn myself and my country and the whole Church of. It is a real, not an imaginary danger.

‘The language of the creed often startles me. If I could use it to condemn any single human being, it would outrage my conscience and my faith. I dare not repeat it because I should feel how monstrous [it was] to be using Christ’s name with my lips while I was outraging His express command: “Judge not that ye be not judged.” But I take that command with me to the recital of the creed. I am never more impressed with the awfulness of it and the duty of recollecting it than when I am saying the creed. I do not ask whether the person who wrote it reconciled it with his obedience to Christ. I hope he did, but I cannot tell. If I can, and if I can lead others my contemporaries to do it, that is all my concern. I see frequently persons who object to this creed, yet who do not object to judge their brethren for some words and some acts. It is only this kind of condemnation which is so shocking to them. But He who would not condemn the woman taken in adultery does not authorise us to condemn, that is to determine the state of mind of any person taken in any act whatsoever; only to condemn the evil, only to consider what the effect of it would be upon us, and how it would affect the community. When I speak of our being more false without that creed, I mean this, that I think we should be attaching a less serious, a more carnal, sense to the words eternal life and eternal death than that creed would lead us to; that we should feel ourselves more free to judge erring individuals a little, because we had thrown off what sounds like a very harsh judgment upon them—so harsh that we must regard it as not meant for any individual offenders at all except ourselves. I must plainly say that there are passages in Arnold's sermons respecting future punishment, and the way we are to think of our friends and those around us, which I could not have uttered for the world. I believe if he had had more sympathy with the idea of the creed he would not have uttered them, they would have shocked his heart and conscience and reverence for God's word. But looking at the future merely in the light of a visitation for transgressions, not as interpreted by the words "This is life eternal," &c., such words were to him natural, almost inevitable.

'If anything I have said confuses your mind throw it into the fire, and pray to God that He will teach you without me. If there is anything on which you would like further information, I shall be heartily glad to write to you, or to talk it over with you.'

To Mr. Daniel Macmillan.

'MY DEAR MACMILLAN,

'November 30, 1852.

'... You would, I know, have faced the obloquy of printing my 'Sabbath Sermons'; but I thought, on the whole, it was better not to put your friendship to that proof. Parker had been very good-natured about the Duke's funeral, and if his father was not afraid, I thought he would be pleased if I asked him. It is more a London than a country or university question, so it is perhaps better, and Mr. —, I am afraid, would never have forgiven you. I have however taken a stronger view of the obligations and blessings of the Sabbath day, than I think any denouncer of the Crystal Palace; but I have spoken some hard words about our inability to hold our flocks together because we have not a Gospel for them, which will not be gratifying in some quarters. A sermon on the Duke is added, because, having not enemies enough, I thought it worth while to fly at Cobden and Co., and one on the interpretation of history which will be denounced as subverting the true meaning of the Apocalypse: I believe it was right to publish them just at this time—but I would rather have let them sleep.’

To Mr. T. Erskine.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND, 21 Queen’s Square, December 21, 1852.

- ‘You will see by a book * which will reach you by this post that I have taken a great liberty with your name. I was afraid you would refuse me if I asked you beforehand, or that I should make you responsible for what I said. I have longed to do what I have done for many years, when an occasion should offer. I wished to tell others how much I believe they, as well as I, owe to your books; how they seem to me to mark a crisis in the theological movements of this time. I would rather take another less public way of saying what I owe to your personal kindness and your conversation; but you will, I hope, forgive me and believe that I did think it a duty to express what I feel towards you, in connection with the task which God has shown me that I am to perform for His Church, that of testifying that the grace of God has appeared to all men.
- ‘Accept our best and most cordial Christian greetings to you and all your circle. I was much delighted by seeing news of the marriage of your nephew to Miss McNab. Pray express to Captain and Mrs. Paterson how heartily we desire all blessings upon their union, and that she may be well enough in health to participate in them.’

* ‘The Prophets and Kings of the Old Testament.’

To Mr. Daniel Macmillan.

‘MY DEAR MACMILLAN,

‘ December 31, 1852.

‘I enclose a letter which you can, if you see fit, forward to Mr. ——. But just as you please. It expresses my most inward convictions, and somehow or other they must come out next year, if they have not this; that is if God preserves to me faith and reason. I do not say “life,” for wherever one is, in one world or another, that, it seems to me, must be one’s work, performed I trust hereafter freely and bravely, not as it has been here, timidly and inconsistently.

‘I am out of town, and only got your letters yesterday. Many thanks for them. I should like to write your name and your brother’s and Hort’s in copies of my ‘Sabbath Sermons.’ Pray tell me what your judgment of them is, looking at them with vigilant, Scotch eyes. I feel nearly sure I am right, but I should like your criticism. The more confident one is about principles the more one trembles at rash applications. But to resist the clamour was a duty which I could not shrink from.

‘I am staying near Kingsley with my wife and children, who love him almost as much as I do. He showed me your kind letter. It will not do—I must be a fighter, not a builder. I hope my boys will have a better time of it. Only think of worthy old Canon Townsend writing me a most kind letter to ask that I would write a book on the metaphysics of St. Paul! Talk of putting down the Chapters after that!’

To Mr. Daniel Macmillan.

‘MY DEAR MACMILLAN,

‘ December 31, 1852.

‘I thank you for sending me Mr. ——’s letter. Whatever he may think of me, it expresses a conviction in which I most cordially sympathise. If I have said in any passage of my books that a man is the author of his own salvation, if I ever had such a thought in my heart, if every word I have spoken with my lips or set down with my pen has not been for the assertion of the doctrine that God is the only source of man’s righteousness, holiness, redemption, he has a right to call me heretic, soul-destroyer, anything he pleases, and I will join him in doing so. Instead of regarding Calvinists, so far as they are the assertors of this truth, as monsters, I have always believed them to be the greatest witnesses for the divinity of all principles, and have honoured them accordingly. Those lectures on the prophets and kings are from first to last an attempt to ground human life and human acts on that principle. The maxim of them is, "Nothing good in man but what was first in God," and this, "All men are righteous so far as they confess a calling from the righteous God and yield to it." From which I deduce, or rather find in Scripture this further doctrine deduced for me, "That all false religion proceeds from the notion that man is to make his way up to God by certain acts or by a certain faith of his, instead of receiving God's witness of Himself and yielding to His government."

'It is just because I find the teaching and the practice of religious men—not Calvinists only, but Calvinists more formally, theoretically, consistently than others—in deadly contradiction with these principles, that I fight against them, and by God's grace will fight against them, for His honour, for the sake of the morality of my country, for the sake of multitudes of young men whom they are driving to Atheism, as well as young women whom they are driving to Rome. Mr. — asks what right he or I have to know why God does this or that? I have no right, that is to say, I have no power to penetrate the depth of His wisdom; moreover I have no wish to do it; I am content to be lost in it. But that is because He has been pleased to reveal to me in His Son the brightness of His glory, His absolute love; because He has shown me that in Him there is no darkness at all. On that point I have a right to be certain; he who says I have not, rejects the Bible, and disbelieves the incarnation of our Lord. I will not give up an inch of this ground; it is a matter of life and death. I find as many puzzles in the world as Mr. — does; if I thought I could explain them by my experience or my reason, I might be a Calvinist or any other theorist; I cannot; I am baffled, and therefore my heart and reason accept the solution which the incarnation, death, resurrection of Christ offer me. They tell me that whatever else is not certain, God's absolute love is certain. They tell me that if any man pretends to have more love than God, to care more for His fellow-men than God cares for them, he lies. For that there can be no love which does not come forth from God's love and is not the image of it. If then there are any persons caring for the shopmen of London, for the working-men of London, for the prostitutes of London, I say it is absolutely certain that God cares for them, and that I am setting man above God if I think otherwise or fear to say this. And I must proclaim that all protests against slavery or any other abomination have an utterly false and godless ground if they don't proceed from this Gospel of God's love to mankind set forth in the only begotten Son. And again that if we do not accept St. John's explanation of those melancholy facts, which Mr. — dwells upon,—“This is the condemnation that light is come into the world and men love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil:” in other words, that though men do not save themselves they do destroy themselves, by yielding to the devil and rejecting their Father in heaven—we deny the Bible, however much we may talk about it. Will you worship the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, or the Devil? Will you acknowledge that Christ is the express image of God's substance? or, will you say that the Father and the Son are utterly unlike in nature and mind? These are the awful questions which are set before us now, and every one must answer them. Those who take the answer from the religious newspapers, and those who take it from the Bible, will, I believe, preach on opposite sides in this great controversy.'

To Rev. M. Maurice.

‘MY DEAREST FATHER, ‘Winchfield, January 1, 1853.

I write a few lines this first morning of the year, which I hope will reach you in the course of the day, to wish you all possible new year's blessings. You have seen a number of new years and a number of changes in each, but I am sure the real witness which they bear as they pass on, is of One who is the same yesterday and to-day and for ever. I do not think anything in the world or in ourselves preaches to us of alteration, without preaching still more of that which abides and cannot alter. May we all learn that lesson and rest with all our hearts in the love which is with us at all times and in all places! And we, who have had so much of abiding affection from our own parents, should desire more earnestly that we and they should always remember from whence it has come forth.'

To Mr. Daniel Macmillan.

'January 27, 1853.

- 'Your brother told me that you had some thought of republishing my 'Subscription no Bondage.' I have been led to reconsider—though without re-reading—what I said in it, and I believe that it ought not to go forth without a statement to this effect. 1. That I am more convinced than ever that the Articles are not terms of communion, and that their use for academical education is what I represented it to be in my pamphlet. 2. That I am more convinced than ever that any Articles which are to bear upon general education should be theological. 3. That I am more convinced than ever that the Articles are more comprehensive (being also less loose and capricious) than the dogmas of our different parties, and that we should be far more at the mercy of the most intolerant private judgments and public opinion if we lost them. But,
- '1. That I think I was wrong in deducing from these premises the opinion that subscription ought to be enforced at the universities.
- '2. That I do not think they are accepted practically or by any great number in the sense in which I urged that they ought to be accepted, but in a different sense, which is dangerous to honesty.

- ‘3. That the experience of the last few years has convinced me that the Articles are not likely to be accepted and understood and applied to the purposes for which I believe they are meant, when subscription to them is demanded at the outset of the university course or previous to taking any degree.
- ‘4. That on other grounds I object to the Cambridge test of being a bonâ fide member of the Church of England.
- ‘5. That though the change of opinion is partly in my own case the result of experiences which I have passed through since I wrote the pamphlet, I believe I ought not to have deduced the conclusion I did from any premises which I then acknowledged, and that I was warned by several friends that I had not proved the doctrine which my title affirmed.
- ‘I will make this partial recantation in any form you think best, provided the pamphlet were to appear again.
- ‘Shall I return Mr. —’s letter? I do not like any more controversy, though perhaps he will conclude as he did in Kingsley’s case, that I am afraid to answer the charge of not believing what I profess to believe. The notion of accusing Kingsley of innuendo! or of any language, or acts but the most straightforward. He certainly, and I hope I, come forth in a new character, with Mr. — as our manager.’

To Miss Priscilla Maurice. (Then almost dying at Hastings.)

‘February 12, 1853.

‘Lucilla says that you will like to have letters, though I hope you will never try to answer them. I did not think when we parted that you would have been called to pass another Lent on earth, though I did and do hope to see you and speak with you. I should have been at Hastings last week, but Lucilla thought I had better not, and that a short visit might only excite you. You know how gladly I will come at any minute, and I could easily get excused from a lecture if it were necessary. On Friday afternoons I am always free till Sunday, and when St. Matthew’s day comes I shall have a holiday from Wednesday at one, to Friday. But let it be just as you wish. I know God will be with you during this time and will help you to do good work for all sufferers, confessing for them, if it be in silence, and giving thanks for them too. If you should be able to think of the prayers, I am sure there will be a great blessing on them; but God will teach you what you can do. I have been much grieved, among other neglects which press heavily on me, by reflecting that I have never really performed Miss Harker's dying wish about a book for Unitarians, though I have tried to make my sermons bear upon them. I have felt I must do it, however much else I may have to do; and I am trying this Lent, though I would not mention it to any one except you and Georgina till I have accomplished something. I hope you will recollect sometimes what I am striving to do, and how many errors I am likely to commit, and how little I have of the true spirit for such a work. But I do wish that it should not be my book at all. My plan is to preach sermons, which I can with a little alteration make into essays, on the questions in which they are most interested. I have written the first, and am to preach it, if God will, to-morrow.*

The passing of the new Act made it necessary to modify the constitution of the Society for Promoting Working-men's Associations. Virtually, now the associations of working-men would be legally recognised. The "Society" which embraced them all, and of which the council was the head, was not a body contemplated by the Act, nor could it easily be brought under legal definition. Practically the work of the promoters had been already accomplished more completely than they themselves recognised at the time.

When they took up the cause of co-operation, co-operation was not merely outside the law, unable to obtain legislative protection, but it was regarded both by public opinion and by the working men as inextricably connected with anti-Christian and revolutionary ideas. When, by the process of letting in the light of day upon the whole facts of the case, and receiving the whole battery of the newspaper press upon their devoted heads, they had succeeded in obtaining calm investigation by House of Commons Committees, the Bishop of London, and the King's College clerical committee, the fight was virtually won. It had taken three years to get the Act passed, which gave legislative sanction to what the newspapers had denounced as "revolutionary nonsense." It was not till eleven years later, that the exponents of public opinion came so completely round that within the same twelvemonth both the great quarterlies proclaimed the essentially "Conservative tendency" of the "movement" ('Quarterly Review,' No. 228, October, 1863, p. 448, 'Edinburgh Review,' No. 246, p. 407, (note), October, 1864) which each had done its utmost to denounce and oppose.*

* The sermon referred to was the first of the series afterwards converted into the 'Theological Essays.'

But whilst the Act was passing both Houses without any opposition, the force of the resistance to the movement came from a new quarter. The stock agitators felt that they were losing their hold on the working-men. Mr. Ernest Jones had seen from the first much more clearly than the ordinary newspaper writers what the effect of such a body of men honestly throwing themselves into the work they were engaged on, must be. He and Mr. Holyoake, the editor of the Reasoner, had been fighting hard for a long time to warn off the working-men from all sympathy with the Christian Socialists. Whilst the Act was passing through the Houses, Mr. Jones † entered on a regular crusade against co-operation. Telling the men that if they had only adhered to the points

* The final recognition of society has perhaps been reserved for this year (1883), when both the Queen and the Prince of Wales formally expressed their pleasure in the progress of the great society now working under rules originally submitted to my father for his approval. The secretary is now Mr. Vansittart Neale, and one of the chairmen at the conference was this year Mr. Hughes. Both Mr. Hughes and Mr. Neale have continued working on in the same cause since they first joined my father and his friends. I ought, however, to say that I believe that, during the worst fury of the newspaper and social storm, valuable orders were received from members of the Royal Family for execution by some of the men's co-operative societies.

† Mr. Ernest Jones had at this moment his influence increased by the fact that he had been, according to the evidence supplied by an almost of the Charter, a Universal Suffrage Parliament would have extracted 100 millions from the pockets of the rich to present to them, he asked them to compare such a prospect with that which co-operation held out, and after this brilliant offer, on a show of hands being called for, no single hand among the men, at a great final meeting at Padiham, was held up for co-operation.

At the same time the men who throughout the country had formed themselves into co-operative bodies without monetary help from the promoters, were, generally speaking, thriving, and slowly extending their business. Those that had been assisted by the promoters, chiefly in London, were, one by one, failing. The reasons for this were various. In the first place the former class were in most cases, at all events in the first instance, associations for distribution and not for manufacture, while those in London were mostly attempts at manufacturing societies. It is not difficult to realise the far greater difficulty which the latter class of bodies would present to effective working under the co-operative system. In the next place the men in London knew much less of one another than was the case in the smaller towns; mutual jealousy and suspicion was much more rampant, and the selection of the best men for important posts much less easy. Above all, the very fact of having to struggle through the early difficulties of scraping together enough capital to start a store, gave to the independent co-operative societies an advantage over those that were nursed by outsiders; the members became known to one another; those men who could not be depended on at a pinch were not tempted to join; mutual respect and esprit de corps were developed; the different office-holders were trained little by little for larger work.

Everything therefore tended to lead the promoters to the conclusion that their most useful function for the future lay in supplying the best advice they could to the men, in combating the false assumptions both of the Ernest Jones and Holyoake unanimous debate in the House of Commons, very badly treated. He had been imprisoned for two years after 1848, and had been exposed to unfair treatment in prison.

type of men, and of the more fashionable public opinion of the day, and above all in combating the ignorance and suspicion which on both sides interfered with a healthy relation between different classes. The promoters' work in fighting for a fair trial for co-operation was done. Its future success depended on the workmen themselves and on their intellectual and moral fitness for the work.

For the moment, however, all the promoters' attention was taken up by the questions which arose in the reconstitution of the society. It was inevitable that the divergency of view, the existence of which has been apparent throughout, should come out into full prominence in this work.

A series of resolutions had been agreed upon by the council as indicating the principles on which a committee should draw up the new constitution. Mr. Ludlow was very anxious that the name “Christian” should be in some form so retained as to imply a conviction that the work on which they were engaged was the carrying out of Christian principles. My father, in addition to the determination which is expressed in the next letter, not to go beyond the resolutions of the council, was, as usual, afraid lest any act of his should tend to constitute a new sect. The more he believed in the soundness of any principle, the more anxious he was to prevent its being made a shibboleth for other men. He was determined not to exclude any men, who were willing to co-operate with him in what he believed to be Christian work, because they would not give that name to it.

To. Mr. Ludlow.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND, ‘Wednesday Morning, March 9, 1853.

‘You are most fully entitled to know the course which I mean to take this evening. If I did not volunteer the information, it was because I did not think we should either of us be the better for another argument on the subject, and I hoped that what I should say might not be quite as offensive to you as you seem to expect that it will. I shall tell the council that I am solely responsible for the delay in the presentation of the report; that I intruded myself into the committee, and took part in its deliberations, claiming that right as president, and wishing to exercise it, because certain resolutions which I had proposed were to be the foundation of the new constitution. I shall say that you proposed a scheme which in many respects I approved, and part of which we have, by your kind permission, adopted; that part of the scheme was framed in conformity with an idea which was not the idea of my resolutions; that part of it gave me—as president—powers which I did not believe that I could rightly or safely exercise. That one of those powers was that of pronouncing on doubtful moral questions. I seized that right beforehand which you would have given me in all cases, and applying it in your particular case, I pronounced solemnly, as in the sight of God, that we had no moral right, as a committee, to go beyond the powers with which we had been intrusted, and to frame a constitution which was not in accordance with the maxim on which we were directed to frame it. To such an act I could be no party, because in my conscience I believe it to be wrong. I could not have looked the council in the face if I had, in the name of Jesus Christ the righteous, practised a fraud upon them. The case is perfectly different, I shall tell them, if they choose to accept the amendment you have now proposed. That is brought fairly and manfully before them as a body. If they can accept it honestly and heartily, I shall be very glad, for I most heartily subscribe to it myself. But I will not make their acceptance or non-acceptance of it any test of what they actually believe, or of the principles upon which they act. However, there are many reasons, besides disbelieving, which may make them unwilling to adopt a particular formula. And I would rather cut off my hand than tempt them to do anything which they do not feel they can do ex animo in God's sight. Whatever the decision is on this point, which I do not mean to influence, I shall equally persist in the course we have followed, fully believing it to be in accordance with the gospel of Christ, and that I am fulfilling my duty as minister of His Church. This is what I am going in substance to say. For all you tell me about your fears for me, I am heartily thankful. I am sure it is one of the many most awful perils which beset us round. I hope to profit by your warnings, though I hope also by God's grace that no fear of offending my best and dearest friends will keep me from proclaiming that truth of Christ as the actual Head of Man, which I was sent into the world to proclaim, and which it seems to me that you have never yet taken in—or at least, which is a much smaller matter, have not apprehended my language on the subject.'

To Mr. Ludlow.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

'Friday, March (?) 1853.

'You must forgive me; I am quite sure you will. I know I have said hard words to you which have given you pain. It gives me very great pain to recollect them, and to think that I have in any way alienated you. I want to say this before to-morrow, that you may know that whatever course you take, or however wrong you may think me, it cannot make the least difference in my affection to you.

'If I have done anything inconsistent with that, do attribute it to myself, or the evil that is in me, and not to want of thankfulness for your warnings and your faithfulness, or to the least distrust of you. I shall esteem it a good if any weakness or wrong which you see or suspect in me, prevents you from holding that exaggerated opinion of what I am, and what I am to do, which I am sure has been hurtful to you, and has caused you such bitter disappointment. Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils. Believe on the Son of God—this is the lesson for us all.'

'21 Queen's Square, April 21, 1853.

'MY DEAR MANSFIELD,

'I heard with great wonder of your return the day before I received your note. I do most heartily welcome you home, though I fear it is to deep and unexpected sorrow.

'But our friends are not really separated from us, either by seas, or by what some call the dark river. The bond is stronger and closer which unites us than they have power to break. God give us more of His spirit of love, that we may feel it and know it. God bless you, my dear friend. I hope we shall soon meet.'

It will be well to record here the enormous success which now (1883) attends the co-operative movement among working-men. There are now 660,000 heads of families, representing it is said a twelfth of the whole population of the kingdom, members of working-men's co-operative societies. The whole movement is avowedly Christian, orderly, loyal. It is steadily growing. As an illustration of its beneficial effects it has been noticed that in those towns in which it is established distraining for small debts hardly exists. Strangely enough, our modern English historians, with all their interest in social movements, have devoted no word to this one. Abroad a wider interest in it is shown in many ways, notably by the appearance a few weeks ago of Herr Brentano's admirable historical sketch. There are still men like Mr. Hodgson Pratt and others, working with devoted enthusiasm in the cause. Its avowed enemies are the enemies of order, who, in some instances, that they may the better attack it, have adopted the name which my father bestowed on the co-operative movement, a name claimed for it amidst applause at the late great conference at Edinburgh.

CHAPTER V.

"The 'Charge' was made out against him somewhat after this fashion :

"1st Count.—Socrates does not reverence the real spiritual powers, whom men reverence on Change, but introduces other quite inferior spiritual powers.

"2nd Count.—He corrupts the youth."—Memorabilia.

"It will be with sin, as it is with so many other things in this day, a question of profit and loss."—Dr. Jelf (Final Letter).

"I believe that it is the God of Salvation who pleads His cause in the heart of every one of His creatures, and so pleads the cause of that creature against the enemies which are assailing him." "It is not a safe thing, whatever we may be told, to tempt men into thinking of God as their enemy; it is a safe thing at all times, in all places, among all people, to say, 'He is for you, whoever may be against you.'"—F. D. M.

PUBLICATION OF THE 'THEOLOGICAL ESSAYS'—CORRESPONDENCE WITH DR. JELF—ACTION OF KING'S COLLEGE COUNCIL—LONG CONTINUED 'RECORD' ATTACK MIXING CO-OPERATION AND THEOLOGY AS CONCURRENT OFFENCES—EXPULSION FROM KING'S COLLEGE.

IN many forms and for many years there had reached my father the cry for help of men in moral and mental confusion. Miss Fox has well described one series of the letters which reached him, as exhibiting "most touchingly, most vividly, most truly, the struggle of doubt, the turbulence of despair, the apathy of exhausted effort so frightfully general among the mechanics of large towns, a something which tells that the present attempts at teaching do not meet the wants of the time, and which shrieks inarticulately enough, but with agony, for guidance, and for a God-inspired lesson on Belief and Duty." But the sources of his knowledge, partly shown from time to time in these volumes, were many and various, and extended to all classes.

At length he had made up his mind to speak to these and to endeavour to supply the need. The Unitarians had a special claim on him. To them he addressed his book. Long before it was published he had quite made up his mind that, with the feeling already existing against him at King's College, the result of its publication would be his dismissal from his professorship. Dr. Jelf had been much alarmed by the attacks of the party religious organs. The Record played upon his fears. Dr. Jelf wrote to them soon after the book appeared to apologise to them and to conciliate them, fearing that the popularity of the college would suffer. He explained that he was examining into the character of the book.

To Miss Priscilla Maurice.

‘Richmond, Whit-Tuesday, 1853.

‘I can write to you with some comfort to-day, whatever sad thoughts, mixed with thoughts of thanksgiving, your birthday may cause to you and to all of us. For Whitsuntide brings with it such pledges of the continual presence of the Comforter, of a life rising out of death, of fellowship with all in Heaven and all in earth, as must needs make every birthday a beautiful witness and symbol of the new birth of ourselves and of all creation, of the ultimate deliverance from everything that has in it decay or death.

* * * * *

‘My mind has been more filled with the Essays, by day and sometimes by night, than has been quite good for me. I should like very much if you were able to look at them some day, as they are in fact my letters which express the deepest thoughts that are in me and have been in me, working for a long time. I have hardly felt able to write any others; not for want of time, but from a kind of preoccupation, which has made me afraid I should not write of what interested those I was writing to, and especially that I should trouble you on your sick-bed with a multitude of things that might worry and wear you. But I hope now to throw them off, and to be less shut up in my own modes of thinking. I do long to get out of them and to sympathise with every one, especially with my own relations, and with those who are in suffering. But they must pray for me, that I may not be possessed and crushed by my own thoughts. I believe I was to write this book, and could not honestly have put it off. Indeed I have been surprised at the way in which it has grown up under my hands, and have felt it less and yet more my own than any I ever wrote. God will do with it what He sees fit, but I sometimes feel as if the publication of it would be a great crisis in my own life, if it affects no other people. There is more solemnity to me about it than about anything else I have done. Perhaps I have said most of what I have to say in it.

'We saw Mrs. Augustus yesterday at Sheen. She is certainly very much better than I ever expected to see her; far better than when I was at Hastings. Once more, many many blessed returns in this world or some other, of your birthday, my dearest Priscilla.'

Also to Miss Priscilla Maurice.

'June 21, 1853.

* * * * *

'I did not write when I sent you my book * through Hurstmonceaux, for I did not want to speak of that, and I had not courage to speak of your voyage, knowing what it must be to you both in the anticipation and retrospect. I never know how to encourage you in such undertakings, though I am sure you were doing right, whatever you have had to suffer. But unless I could suffer also, it seems like mere emptiness to seem as if one understood it. The fear of being a mere utterer of empty phrases which jar upon the ear and heart, grows, I think, upon me. It makes me silent when my wishes as well as my duty would lead me to speak. I wonder how I dared to minister so long in a hospital; still more do I wonder that I learnt so little there. Some day I hope really to understand visiting Christ in those sick and in prison, and to do it; at present I seem to myself the hardest and least sympathising of all people. I have, however, been enabled to speak some words which may, I hope, teach some of my brethren how they may do what I have not done, and be what I have not been. And God is glorified, I believe, sometimes in its being seen how paltry and helpless we are.'

* The 'Theological Essays.'

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'June 27, 1853.

'A dishonest clergyman, eight years ago, abstracted the volume of my set of Augustine which contains the "De Civitate." I had a separate copy of the treatise, but where it is I know not. That contains the passage (I think about the 13th or 14th book) to which I refer. It is not a statement about original sin or the fall. But it distinctly lays down the proposition that man is not in his normal condition unless he is looking out of himself, walking secundum Deum. Suppose that to be true, and that the prolapsarian state was a normal state, which all assume, it cannot have been a state in which the man had some goodness of his own (as our doctors teach). It must have been a state in which he neither had nor pretended to any. And his fall must have been when he began to set up some, and not to walk secundum Deum. Justification by faith (to use the speech of these doctors) must be a provision against the fall, a contrivance invented because man could not stand by himself any longer; it must be the only law for men in paradise or anywhere else.

'As for Augustine, I am wont to distinguish his post-baptismal life into three parts (they exist chronologically, but the distinction is essential, not chronological. He was all three parts always, though each may have come into greater light in its own time). First, the wrestler with Manichæanism. He sees that God must be absolutely good, that all goodness in man must proceed from Him, and is realised in proportion as the man does not try to be good in himself. This is his highest condition. Second, the opposer of Donatism. He never apprehends the true ground of the opposition; never sees that the Church is holy in Christ, not in its individual members; contradicts the Donatists only by maintaining that certain people in the Church are holy, certain unholy, and that the last must be borne with. Third, anti-Pelagian. He is terribly right and terribly wrong. He is inclined at first to sympathise with Pelagius because he asserts God's goodness and free-will as he had done against the Manichæans. He is startled by discovering that he supposes some good to be in the man himself, which is in opposition to his own fundamental conviction about the κατὰ θεόν. He is bothered with his own anti-Donatist, individualising, doctrines, and can see no way out of the scrape but by asserting God's absolute calling and decrees. And this, instead of being what it was in his anti-Manichæan fervour, becomes little more than a wilful call and decree; not the will of a perfectly good Being carrying out one blessed purpose. So he was obliged to make all sorts of theories about original sin; hard enough I dare say. But the root of the matter, an essential acknowledgment of God's absolute goodwill and nearness to us, was in him, and justifies all you have said in "Hypatia." Never mind his dogmatism.'

Also to Rev. C. Kingsley.

(In answer to the letter on p. 372, vol. i., of Mr. Kingsley's 'Life.' Dr. Jelf's letter, referred to in each of the next two, had been written on July 8.)

'Clyro, South Wales, July 19, 1853.

'Your letter came to greet us on my first Sunday here, and right welcome it was. It went ill with me to be obliged to leave London without seeing you, and I longed much to hear how you were all going on. I will not conceal it that I also wanted to know your judgment of my Essays, which you have given me so faithfully. I suppose I should generally demur to any such sentence as that the book might make an era in our ecclesiastical history. But on this occasion I don't, though it would not surprise me if it fell flat on its back, and did not rise again. I also should not be surprised if it did reveal the thoughts of many hearts, if it were for the falling and rising again of many in Israel. If it should lead to a schism, woe to me, should I be the cause of the offence ! But I do not know how we are to rise out of schism, unless some one proclaims Christ as the centre of unity to each man and all men ; and voices of the living and of the dead ringing continually in my ears, with, I think, a diviner voice of One that liveth and was dead, tell me that I ought to do that, whether men hear or are deaf. Many thanks for what you say of the style. I am ashamed of myself for not having spoken more intelligibly ; if I did believe what I feign to believe, that Christ is in every man, I am sure I could hold communion by words or signs with every man. So the fault is a moral one. But, indeed, I have tried to overcome it. I have deliberately given up the long sentences which, misled by Coleridge's judgment, I used to approve. And in direct defiance of him, I never talk of objective and subjective, and always give and demand change for technical phrases instead of seeking out a new terminology. Still I have not done what I ought. You shall write notes for me living or dead, if you have not something much better to do with your time ; but God has other work for you, I know. Don't speak of it to any one ; but Mrs. Kingsley, if you please, for I have not said a word about it to any of my relations or to Hare, but your praise of "wariness" is very ill bestowed. I knew when I wrote the sentences about eternal death, that I was writing my own sentence at King's College. And so it will be. Jelf is behaving very fairly, even kindly ; but the issue is quite certain. I hope to be shown how I may act, so that my tumble may involve no loss of liberty to any English clergyman, but rather a growth of boldness and conviction. But this must be as God sees it best for us. I know I have done a very serious thing, but I am more than ever convinced that it was necessary. Never mind whether there are passages in the Prayer Book that you find difficult or not, I would never strain any conscience a hair's breadth to bring them into consent with a conclusion of mine. I am convinced that, on the whole, that Book raises me above my private judgment, and the private judgment of the religious and the irreligious world. I am convinced that my allegiance to it saves me from superstitions into which I must fall if I obey Mr. Chapman or myself. I am convinced it preaches a Gospel to mankind which no Dissenters and no infidels preach. I am convinced that God will take it from us, if He sees it does not help us but harms us. Till then, I turn to it for protection against Record, Guardian, King's College councils, His Grace the Archbishop, Mr. Emerson, the brothers Newman, Dr. Cumming and Pius IX. And, as I have told Dr. Jelf, Scotch Kirk (State and Free) men and orthodox Dissenters and Unitarians are looking with much doubt and misgiving, yet wistfully, towards us, and will find a home with us if we do not make the English Church into an Evangelical Alliance, and call upon the world to fraternise in the belief of everlasting punishment, but in the belief of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Hard fighting is in store for us, dearest friend; but those that are with us are stronger than those who are against us, though we ourselves may be often among the latter. Let us hope mightily for the future. There will be a gathering of Christ's host, as well as the Devil's, out of the ranks of Pharisees and Sadducees, of publicans and harlots. We shall not have to choose our own ground, it will be fixed for us; all we shall have to do is to keep it. Meantime the present with me is agreeable enough. We are in a comfortable parsonage, a beautiful country, and I hope among a friendly, open-hearted people. Mr. Venables has left us all we can wish in the way of carriages, so that Georgina is able to get about, without fatigue, in the country round, and she trusts she shall be able to make friends in the cottages near. She sends her kind love and hopes to write soon to Mrs. Kingsley. Love to all of you.'

The "letter to Hort," referred to in the next letter is that given on p. 15, etc. It represents exactly my father's standpoint, from which he never varied throughout the correspondence with Dr. Jelf, which had now begun.

‘Clyro, South Wales, August 2, 1853.

‘MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

‘I am sure that you are right as to the line which I ought to take. I have always purposed to stand on the Articles, and to assert my privilege to reject all popular notions while I adhere to them. But it has seemed to me that the battle is not yet begun. I do not think Jelf feels himself competent to engage in it. He merely states his own fears and asks for my explanations, which I have given him. My letter to Hort was more definite than anything you have read, and that he has. It says distinctly, in 1stly, 2ndly, 3rdly, in this and that: I will not bind myself, and no one can make me, unless he is able to change our forms! My reason for arguing the point to the extent I have argued it is this: I feel that if it is to be an open question, we must take a higher ground than merely saying it is one. It ought to be open because neither I nor anybody else has a right to force a definition of the word eternal or a theory of punishment on any man, the Articles being silent.

‘But I must plainly declare that I cannot preach the Gospel at all if I am tied to the popular notions on the subject; that I cannot use the prayers, that I cannot call the Bible God’s book. The Unitarians and Spiritualists may say what they like; but those who compel me to use the language of the Record and Guardian on this or any of the topics I have discussed in my essays, compel me to renounce the formularies I have subscribed.

‘I appeal to Cæsar against the Jews, and the Felixes and Festuses if they decide for the Jews. I do not merely claim a right to interpret Cæsar’s decrees in a certain way. Your own belief that it must be an offensive war will lead you, I think, to the same conclusion. I feel the tremendous responsibility of maintaining this position; it must appear to be the condemnation of other men. But I cannot help it.

God must see to His own cause. He knows well enough that I cannot defend it, but if He chooses that I should just at this moment maintain the truth that He is the deliverer of men and not their destroyer, I suppose He knows best. The question becomes more serious and awful to me the more I think of it. I feel more astonished at the crisis to which we have come. I can only ask that the Church may be brought through it, and that I may not do mischief by doing anything out of my own head. We do indeed require to pray that we may do the right thing. The religious people, High Church and Evangelical, will be as much blessed ultimately if they get their minds cleared on this subject (very many after a long process will) as the infidels. Of course one looks to be trodden down by the hoofs of both, but that cannot signify much; nor even if they should agree to be indifferent; for the truth will worry them, if they are ever so careless about my way of stating it. I send you the two last missives on the subject; please return the former. My last note is written with a knowledge that Jelf is particularly sensitive about his Orthodoxy on the Arian Controversy, and will be somewhat perplexed by finding how nearly he has brought himself into the grips of the Arian formulæ. Yet who can escape it, who will confuse time with eternity? Possibly the Bishop of London will come into the field before very long—he is chairman of our King's College council—and this will be the time for availing myself of your advice. I trust I shall be preserved from shirking out at any back door. I think I shall call upon him to see whether he objects to my preaching in his diocese, telling him that, if he does, I shall not stand on my position as a chaplain of Lincoln's Inn, which is nominally out of his jurisdiction, but will resign at once. That will bring the question to an issue; but till I see how he acts, it would be rash to resolve upon my course.

‘Have you seen the Morning Advertiser? S. (our old friend), I suppose, from the line he takes.’

Life is not of the simple character that it would be represented to be if I gave the history of this correspondence without a break. Inextricably interwoven with it were other troubles, which came on him at the same time.

In the new constitution of the Society for Promoting Working-Men's Associations it fell to my father to appoint two "assessors" to occupy the chair when he was absent. He appointed Mr. Ludlow and another. Mr. Ludlow objected to the appointments, on the ground that he himself, having objected to the actual constitution, would not carry the confidence of the society with him. He suggested Mr. Hughes and Mr. Walter Cooper, the tailor, instead. My father was, as his friends complained, afflicted with "a cholera of resignations," being always excessively shy of the prominent position in which he found himself, and equally determined not to maintain his position an hour longer than it was of service to the cause he was engaged in, or to retire from it whilst it meant only that it was his duty to receive the hardest knocks. His conviction, however, that he had already provoked so much hostility from many quarters that his name was only an injury to any cause he aided, was so strong, that the smallest indication that any of his friends thought they could dispense with him, induced him to propose to resign his position; so that, as Mr. Hughes puts it, "it was awful work having to fix him up again against his will every three or four months in one post or another which he thought he might slip out of." On this occasion, convinced as he was that the result as to King's College was a foregone conclusion, he had no hesitation as to his course about the promoters. He believed that a dismissed professor would not be a protection to them; the worst of the obloquy had been fought through and a legal triumph had been won; he could have no fear, therefore, that he was yielding to any temptation to desert, from any fear of consequences to himself.

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘1853.

‘No one who knows my feelings towards either Cooper or Hughes would suspect me of omitting either of these from any other cause than the fear of doing them an injury. There are no men I should have liked better for assessors, but I did not venture to introduce one working-man, when I knew not how many I might pain by omitting them. I chose the assessors not to please myself at all. Your letter leaves me but one alternative. With a pain greater than you can easily know, unless you knew exactly how I am feeling for other reasons at this time, but with far less fear of doing injury to the cause than I ever had before, I resign the presidentship. To retain it when I have lost the confidence of the society, and when they have so little confidence in each other as your letter proves that they have, would be a contradiction of all our professions. I quite submit to the justice of your charges against me personally. I have neglected work, which I doubt not I ought to have performed. I cannot, for the mere sake of self-accusation, say that I have neglected the working classes. I believe I have thought of them and striven for them, not as I ought, but more this year than in any previous one. But I have not done the things that you had a right to expect from me. Added to many humiliations which God has seen that I need and has sent, I accept this as perhaps the most needful of all. I do not know that I need write more--I might fall into self-justification, if I did, which I am anxious to avoid. Thank you for your kindness in getting Huber what he wanted.’

‘Clyro, Hay, South Wales, August 10, 1853.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

*

*

*

*

*

‘I have cancelled your two appointments and named Cooper and Hughes assessors. I have signified, at the same time, to Shorter * that as soon as the council is appointed I hope they will depose me. I could not of course resign when I found I should embarrass all the movements of the society, but I have lost the confidence of you, and, no doubt, of others, and I am sure I am better out of the way.'

* The Secretary of the Council of Promoters.

Also to Mr. Ludlow.

'Clyro, Hay, South Wales, August 19, 1853.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

'I found your letter on my return from Manchester,* and was greatly cheered by it. I should have written to thank you for it yesterday, but I had several rather long letters which I was forced to send off, and our post does not leave us much time for answering. The conference went off, I think, remarkably well. There was some fighting about the profits of workers not associates, but the feeling on the whole was good and friendly, though there were signs enough that a more stringent moral code to put down, or at least denounce, positive breaches of honesty in trade, is needful, as well as a higher and more inspiring principle. Neale's lecture was very good, and he came out with a quickness and cleverness in his answers to the questions which were asked by different persons in the room, when it was over, that surprised me. I think perhaps Newton took rather too prominent a share in all the discussions. Do you think his land scheme is one that can safely be recommended? I am a little afraid about it, and was exceedingly anxious that the conference should not be in the least committed by it. Ultimately it was only presented for consideration.'

To Archdeacon Hare.

'Clyro, August 20, 1853.

'My correspondence with Dr. Jelf is swelling into a volume; and is to be concluded, he tells me, with something almost amounting to a theological essay from him. I have told him that I do not see how argument can now make much difference, as far as my position is concerned. If he, as

* Where he had been presiding at a great "Co-operative Conference."

Principal, disapproves of a professor, and says that he cannot work with him, said professor must be dismissed—the discipline of the college could not otherwise be maintained, and the council have no choice. But I have said also that I shall not anticipate their decision by resigning, first because I do not want to evade any censure they may see fit to pass upon me ; secondly, because I must have it clearly understood that I do not leave the college because I object to any single Article, doctrine, phrase, to which I have subscribed, but solely because I object to a certain popular construction of a certain theological term, which construction I hold to be not the simple, natural, and orthodox one ; thirdly, because I demand it as an act of justice from the authorities of the college who have used the Record as their organ of communication with the public, that they should say whether they agree with the Record in regarding me as a scoundrel, or whether, after their experience of thirteen years, they esteem me an honest man.

‘ This I have the same right to ask as any footman has who is turned off by his master, certain persons having said that he was dismissed for a habit of drunkenness and robbing the pantry. More I do not wish. So I hope to make it clear that an English clergyman has full liberty to maintain every position which I have maintained in my essays, and that a set of new Articles must be framed before he can be deprived of that liberty.’

To Archdeacon Hare.

‘ MY DEAR JULIUS,

‘ Clyro, August 22, 1853.

‘ I wrote my last letter before I received your very kind one. I told you the substance of my communication to Jelf ; the enclosed has just come to me in answer. I wish very much for your judgment upon it ; of course if Stanley is kind enough to give me his also, I shall be grateful. The question as to me is settled, but the steps I take may seriously affect other men and the Church. I do not wish to embarrass the council or the bishops, who have always been kind to me ; I am very anxious not to injure the position of Trench or of Edward,* whom I have purposely abstained from consulting or writing to in any part of the business; and I may save anything approaching to, or having the appearance of, an ecclesiastical censure upon the principle I have maintained by giving in. But, on the other hand, it is very important that it should be understood I do not admit the force of a single argument of Jelf's, and that I leave the college simply because he cannot work with me. His present letter is polite enough, and stronger than he often is; but I do not want that he should put into the mouth of the council words about my "unhappy publication," &c.'

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

Clyro, Hay, South Wales, August 24, 1853.

' . . . The King's College business is nearly concluded. The only question is now whether I shall resign or wait for dismissal. Jelf, of course, urges the first course as most convenient to him and to the college, and I am well inclined for my own sake to adopt it. But the question is, which is the right thing to do for the sake of the Church and of the great principle which I am certain is at stake. I cannot and would not teach under a principal who objects to my teaching, but I must bear what testimony I can for the right of English divines to preach the gospel of God's love to mankind, and to maintain that Lord Shaftesbury and the Bishop of London do not care more for the outcasts of the race than He does. If Humanity and Theology are not to be for ever apart, the regeneration of the working classes is not to be given up by Christians to infidels. This point must be settled somehow. That which stirred the heart of Europe in the 16th century is not more vital. I think I may be in town next week to talk over the subject with Hare, and, if we can meet, with Kingsley, and I should like very much to have your advice.'

* Rev. E. H. Plumptre, his brother-in-law.

‘MY DEAR JULIUS,

‘August 29, 1853.

‘Many thanks for your kind advice, which I am sure is also wise, and which I intend to follow. I had, as you saw, decided not to resign. I was shaken for a very short time in that resolution by considering the inconvenience to which I should put the college, if they had no lectures in two departments at the beginning of their session; and also by the hope that their language might be explicit and satisfactory in taking leave of me even then. But when I further reflected on Jelf’s letter, and saw that he spoke of himself as the person who would probably express the mind of the council, and that he held it out as a kind of boon that my theology should not be inquired into, I saw the necessity of taking the course you recommend. Before I got your letter, I had written to him saying that I should reserve my answer to the substantial part of his till I had received his final communication, but that in the meantime I protested against the phrases “unhappy publication,” “fallen into error,” “entangled in subtleties”—that if the publication (of which at present he had noticed only two or three sentences) was unhappy, all I had ever written was so, and all my teaching in the college had been so; that if I was in error I had not fallen into it since I came into the college; that there was nothing in this book which was not implied in books I had written before he asked me to be theological professor, and of which he had due notice; finally that the subtlety of distinguishing eternity from time was one which I have learnt from St. Paul, Athanasius and Augustine, and (this I had told him before) that I did not see any escape from Arianism if I abandoned it. But though I am clear that you are right so far, I should wish it clearly to be understood by all my friends, that I would not, if I could, avert the final decree of the college that I ought to resign. I should hold them to be very wrong if they decided otherwise. I do not desire to continue in the college. I cannot continue after my superior has declared my theology to be unsound. It could only be a question whether they should banish him or me, and I should be a madman to try that issue. The safe course and the right one is to show that I am not fighting for the privilege of maintaining a false position or of driving out another person, but for my right as an English clergyman to hold and to teach what I have held and taught. The immense importance of the object makes every other seem to me utterly insignificant. It is well enough to say that King's College is a post of usefulness. To me it would be a post of usefulness no longer, but of exceeding mischief, after I had found myself at war with the Principal. So that I give up the battle as to the college, and wish every one to give it up on my behalf, that I may fight it at better advantage as to the Church. I want a direct declaration from the council to this effect—We request you to resign because you are at variance with the Principal, in whom we have confidence, not because we hold you to hold or to teach that which a clergyman subscribing to the Articles and the Prayer Book has no right to teach. They may have their own private opinions how far I am right or wrong; but I think they will understand that if we have Articles, and I profess my adherence to them, I am as little bound by their private opinions, or Jelf's, as they are by mine. And that I wish to have plainly declared.'

To Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Maurice.

'September 2, 1853.

'MY DEAREST FATHER AND MOTHER,

'I hope this will reach you on the fifty-ninth anniversary of your wedding-day, and may find you both as well as we can dare to hope for those who have lived so long and been permitted to diffuse so many blessings around them. May God bless you both abundantly in all the years to come, whether they are spent in this world or in some better one.

'I cannot tell you, my dearest mother, how much your good and brave words about King's College cheered me. I am quite sure that I shall be dismissed from it, and I do not wish to remain in it, because I believe my giving up will do more to promote the principles I have maintained than my stay in it could do. Therefore I shall go, when the time comes, with hearty good will and, I hope, in charity towards all men.'

'MY DEAR JULIUS,

'Clyro, September 2, 1853.

'Thank you very much for your letter, and the Bishop's [St. Davids], which I return. I am very thankful for his kind judgment, but he will be in a small minority among the bishops. I was surprised and gratified exceedingly that there was some hope the Bishop of Oxford might not greatly object. I dare not expect his sympathy, but I am sure he will be very kind under the circumstances. I believe my stay at King's College would weaken my position in the Church, and would make the protest I have borne for some principles that seem to me all-important, nearly ineffectual. Jelf will accept some of them, "in a sense," others he will repudiate as dangerous. I must show that I am pleading for a simple natural sense—not for one that I would impose upon any, for I think the formularies are better than my explanations, or any others that are likely to be offered of them—but a sense which I have not only a right to hold but to publish. I have been free at King's College, hitherto; henceforth I should be "cabined, cribbed, confined," every moment subject to the hint of some "high authority," or liable to be canvassed on the charge of some newspaper. It would be a false position altogether for any one who has to teach teachers. And therefore the sooner the council rid me of it—provided they recognise my rights as a clergyman, and the rights of all who think as I do, to speak what we say in the church though not in their college—the better for us all.'

On September 6, Dr. Jelf, in order that as little time as possible might be lost before the question was brought to an issue, sent my father the beginning, in printed slips, of his final letter. These slips disclosed in the clearest manner possible the fact that Dr. Jelf looked upon that view of "eternal life" which makes it synonymous with an endless future state, as the only true one to the exclusion of all others, and that Dr. Jelf did so because nothing seemed to him so important for the interpretation of Scripture and for the establishment of a sound theology, as that the notion of rewards and punishments, and not the revelation of God, should be felt to be the end of the Divine dispensation. I have, in the above statement of Dr. Jelf's position, which is, I believe, a perfectly fair one, chosen the wording, so that it is in express terms the exact inversion, as will be seen by reference to p. 398, Vol. I., of my father's words in 1845 as to what seemed to him to be more important than anything else in these matters. This was for my father the crux of the whole matter. As long as it had been a question whether he had or had not clearly conveyed to Dr. Jelf the conviction that he had himself no wish to dogmatise on the question of the "endless duration of future punishments," and that he only protested against all dogmatism on the subject, he was anxious to continue the discussion; he was diffident as to his own expressions; he was anxious for the suggestions of friends. From the moment that it became clear that Dr. Jelf believed that the one business of a preacher was not to proclaim a good news of God to mankind, but to trust for the efficiency of his preaching to the terrors of future punishment and the hopes of future reward he was able to awaken, he wrote as follows:

'MY DEAR JULIUS,

'September 8, 1853.

'Could you kindly look over these,* sending them back by Sunday's post. I have drawn the sword and thrown away the scabbard, telling Jelf plainly in a note to-day that I see the differences between us are wider and deeper than even he supposes; that they affect the essence of the Gospel and the whole interpretation of the Bible; that I shall say to the council: "Do you hold your professors to the Principal's interpretation of our formularies? If you do, on that ground our connection is dissolved;"—to the bishop: "Do you hold me bound to accept the Principal's interpretation, if I officiate in your diocese? if you do, you silence me. Will you turn to the passages in St. John's Epistle about eternal life, which Jelf affirms—simply as a thing to be taken for granted—concern the future state of the blessed. I will send you my answer as soon as it is written. A great deal is at stake, and I feel the responsibility very much.

* I. e. Dr. Jelf's slips.

‘I hope you will notice the defence of the translators of Matt. xxv.—“The rhythm of the passage, and the love of Saxon.” This is the morality and reverence for God's word we are to teach our pupils!’

‘MY DEAR JULIUS,

‘Clyro, September 15, 1853.

‘I expressed myself very ill if I led you to suppose that I meant to insist upon my interpretation of the Bible or the Articles, and to call upon the council to repudiate Dr. Jelf's. I wish most strongly to protest against the claim on his part or mine, or anybody's, to impose new Articles upon the Church. I am content with what are given us. I adhere to them. I say it is enough that he and I should make this profession; if the world or the Church thinks we, either of us, do not make it honestly, the world or the Church is not our judge, and it is a great fool if it contracts its own liberty by seeking to forge chains for us. But I must draw the sword (it may be more correct to say he has drawn it first, but I do not quarrel about that) and throw away the scabbard in this sense: that I will not submit to his construction of Scripture, and of our forms; that I will show why submission to it would “throw an atmosphere of doubt” upon the plainest passages of Scripture; upon the Gospel we have to preach; upon the nature and eternity of God. That is no reason why he should not adhere to it, and be a Principal, and be made a bishop. I shall not stand up to oppose at Bow Church when his Si quis, or whatever the form of the farce may be, is read. But it is a reason why I should tell the council that they silence me, and numbers besides me as preachers of the Gospel, if they will insist upon our denying that God wills all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth.

‘A crisis, I am convinced, is at hand which will bring the question to an issue, whether we are believing in what Dr. Jelf calls a religion of mercy (proved to be such because phrases about salvation are to phrases about damnation as 57 : 8—the Bible being a great betting book, where the odds on the favourites are marked as at Doncaster or Newmarket), or whether we believe in a Gospel of deliverance from sin and perdition. We cannot avert this crisis. I did not willingly do anything to hasten it, God knows. But I saw from the multitudes that are throwing off belief—all belief, on this ground—and the multitudes that are pretending to believe in God, while they mean the Devil, that it must come and that it was safer to meet it. Having this conviction, I feel all gratitude to the Bishop of Oxford for his kind and generous efforts to save me or to avoid scandal. But it cannot be. The scandal is there; the old scandal or rock of offence which cannot be removed, and over which I fear numbers among us, as among the Jews, will stumble and fall, and be broken in pieces. I dread that calamity for myself as much as for any, but I am sure that I shall not escape it by trying to maintain a position in the college which is untenable. Dr. Jelf and the Record must have their pæan over some man, that they may not have to boast of a victory over the whole Church and over God’s truth. It is a very small Jonah to throw to the whale.’

I give next the following letter, because a statement of the case, from another pen than my father’s, will, perhaps, show the broad issues more clearly than any single one of his own.

From Archdeacon Hare to a Layman.

‘October 4, 1853.

‘Of course I cannot but feel a strong personal interest in the question. For it is impossible to know Maurice, as I have done intimately for thirty years, without admiring and loving him; indeed, taking him altogether, his head and his heart, he is incomparably the grandest example of human nature that it has ever been my happiness to know. Still I have not the slightest wish that the decision in this matter should be influenced by any motive but a strict regard to truth and justice, and to the good of the Church; nay, if the laws of our Church require that Maurice should be expelled from his professorship, let him be so, although I can anticipate nothing but the most disastrous consequences from his condemnation.

'The one point in the 'Essays' on which Dr. Jelf grounds his denunciation, is the passage about eternal death, pp. 432-442; which, however, cannot be understood except when taken along with the dozen pages just before, nor fully except in connection with the whole volume.

'From taking them solely by themselves Dr. Jelf has fallen into such an utter misunderstanding, as to charge Maurice with teaching that impenitent, unbelieving sinners will ultimately be saved, whereas the doctrine which runs through the whole book is, that this itself is damnation—impenitence and unbelief, and that the only possible salvation is that communion with God to which we are raised through penitence and faith. Nor will Dr. Jelf's metaphysical capacity allow him to frame any other conception of eternity than as an indefinitely long time, so that he deems Maurice a heretic for deriving his conception of "eternal life" from our Lord's words in John xvii. 2, 3, the only conception which will enable us to understand all the other passages where St. John uses the expression.

'With regard to the legal question, it seems to me pretty nearly decided by the omission of the 42nd Article of the series of 1552—which condemns all such as teach the doctrine of universal salvation—at the revision of the Articles in 1562. How this omission was brought about I know not; it seems to be one of those providential interpositions of a higher wisdom, which were so often granted to the Reformers of our Church. But by the omission, the Church seems to have declared that she does not condemn the doctrine of universal salvation. Now what Maurice teaches is far short of this. He merely says that the opposite doctrine is a human tradition, resting on no adequate scriptural authority. As to what will be, he does not presume to pronounce any dogma, but winds up with that beautiful conclusion in p. 442.

An additional reason which makes me look with dread on anything having the character of an ecclesiastical condemnation of this book, is the terrible shock which such a condemnation would give to that large portion of the intelligent minds in all classes whom he has powerfully influenced by his teaching and his writings. I do not believe that there is any other living man who has done anything at all approaching to what Maurice has effected, in reconciling the reason and conscience of the thoughtful men of our age to the faith of our Church. I am continually meeting with instances of persons whom he has brought to a lively reception of the truth, whose reason and conscience would otherwise have driven them into infidelity; and I believe it is in great measure owing to him that the intellect of the rising generation is with us rather than against us. This arises not merely from his intellectual powers, but from the moral grandeur which goes along with it and sanctifies it. Now it will grievously disturb all these men if they find that the Church rejects him whom they revere as her wisest teacher. Many of them will probably fall away from her, some, it is to be feared, into some of the forms of rationalising or sentimentalising unbelief. Meanwhile the Record and the slaves of the Record will set up a shout of triumph which will be taken up and prolonged by all the Unitarians and other contemners of our faith, who will exclaim, "Here is a man who has been labouring with all his heart and soul, and mind, to show that the doctrines of your Church are not repugnant to the reason and conscience of mankind; and you have immediately cast him out."

At this moment Dr. Colenso was Bishop-designate of Natal.

He at this time differed from my father's view that the words "eternal punishment" did not necessarily involve the idea that the subjects of it are in endless torture. He had been accepted as a divine in all respects concurring in the "popular" views on theological subjects. But, in bringing out a series of sermons, just before his consecration, he prefaced them with a warm dedication to my father, avowedly doing so as a protest against the attacks at this time made by the Record upon my father.

'MY DEAR COLENZO, '21, Queen's Square, October 7, 1853.

'When I returned here two days ago my eyes were greeted by the sight of your volume and of the dedication to me. I really do not know what to say to you about that. If I told you that it delighted me beyond any praise I almost ever received, I should express but half the truth. I should convey a very inadequate impression of my own feelings of the generosity and courage which your words manifest, and of the strength and hope which they imparted to me. But I should also not let you see the real fear and distress which your kindness occasioned me. When I consider the great work to which you are called, and the troubles which must, at all events, await you in it, I could not but tremble lest I had been the means of causing you a new and unnecessary hindrance. I am afraid the English bishops—to say nothing of the religious press—will visit upon you the offences which a large portion of them is willing to charge upon me. And I could have wished that you had stifled all your regard for me rather than run this risk. Nevertheless, I do so thoroughly and inwardly believe that courage is the quality most needed in a bishop, and especially a missionary bishop, that I did at the same time give hearty thanks to God that He had bestowed such a measure of it upon you.

'You see I am very contradictory in my thoughts about your letter. But I am most harmonious in my thoughts and wishes about you. I am sure God is sending you forth to a mighty work, in which you will be able wonderfully to help those who are toiling in poor old England; and I do, from my heart, desire for you and your dear wife, and your children, all earthly and heavenly gifts. May God bless you abundantly; so prays one upon whom you have conferred a greater kindness than you can estimate—for it has come to me when I wanted it most.'

'MY DEAR JULIUS, '21, Queen's Square, October 8, 1853.

- 'I have only Dr. Jelf's letter in scraps, and the last scraps only reached me two days ago; such as they are I send them to you. I wish I could send you also my defence, which has been written under some disadvantages, and has had to undergo additions and alterations as the charges took a more definite shape.
- 'Nevertheless, I am quite content that it should go in as it is, and I have begged that there may be no further delay. To expedite matters, I have taken the MS. to a printer to-day. I hope for proofs on Tuesday, which you shall have at once. I shall, I hope, have a copy for each member of the council ready on Friday. They will meet, but I should suppose can decide nothing at present. They will probably adjourn to consider, for I trust they will not be satisfied with the secretary's reading of the documents which will be submitted to them. I have followed your advice—not resigning, striking out anything which seemed harsh or merely personal to any who heard the letter, asserting Jelf's full right to hold his opinion, and only maintaining mine to be equally strong, according to the Articles. I have, however, stated so distinctly the radical difference between his theology and mine, that it is impossible we can work longer together. Trench, who thought differently the day before yesterday, has, I believe, come round to that opinion since he read the indictment and the replication. Then the battle will have to be fought over again by the publication of the letters, which I demand. The importance of the subject and of the crisis has become so manifest to me since I have talked more with other persons on the subject, that I am more than ever desirous to avoid anything of sharpness or recrimination. Dr. Jelf's last note, you will perceive, is amicable, though he has thrown out a rather curious insinuation about the probability of other Anabaptist tenets (promiscuous marriages and confiscations) growing out of my doctrine about eternity. That will tell upon Sir Robert Inglis and Lord Radstock. I long to see you, but I do not know when it is to be. All here, especially my colleagues, are very kind, and the work at King's College is much less trying than I expected. Colenso, yet unconsecrated, has had the kindness and courage, I am afraid the rashness, to dedicate a volume of sermons to me. I hope it will not set him at war with the English bishops.'

'MY DEAR JULIUS,

'October 11, 1853.

'I should like very much to go to Hurstmonceaux this week, but as the council meets on Friday, I fear I cannot go down that night. I have no doubt they will adjourn, but still I may have to answer inquiries on Saturday; possibly the bishop may wish to see me. I think, therefore, I must put it off. I shall be free enough soon, and then I shall hope to see you. I did not tell you what a pleasant visit, though only of one night we had at Abergwille. The bishop was full of kindness.

*

*

*

*

*

'He wanted to take me to see a sunset from the hill; his servant was bent upon counteracting the plan, partly from fear we should be too late for dinner, and proposed by way of substitute that we should go to see the pigs, which edified the bishop exceedingly. I was very sorry we could not stay.'

To Mr. Ludlow.

'Queen's Square, October 13, 1853.

... The essays, and the one to which you allude especially, have, I am told, relieved the minds of some of a heavy load, and for that I must be thankful. I am sorry that they have given you pain. I have no doubt they have themselves, or rather me, to blame for the greater part of it, though I cannot help thinking that the persons you say you have chiefly associated with may partly be the cause. I do not think you could look favourably on any book which you heard praised. If you had been with those who called me a heretic and a devil, I have no doubt I should have had you for a far too partial and zealous champion.*

I have been kindly furnished by the present council of King's College with the following extracts from their minutes. A few sentences are included here and there which are irrelevant to the purpose of this book. This is done because the council very naturally furnished the papers on the understanding that, if published, they should be given entire.

Extract from the Minutes of a Meeting of the Council, held Friday, October, 14, 1853.

The following letter from the principal, a copy of which had been sent by the secretary to every member of the council, was read and ordered to be entered on the minutes.

‘King’s College, London, October 8, 1853.

‘MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

‘It is my painful duty to call your attention to a book lately published, which bears upon its title-page ‘Theological Essays,’ by Frederick Denison Maurice, M.A., Chaplain of Lincoln’s Inn, and Professor of Divinity in King’s College, London. The part which I would especially bring under your notice, as in my opinion very dangerous and unsound is the conclusion of the last essay, from p. 432 to p. 449.

‘The nature and ground of the objections which I entertain to the statements therein contained, will be learnt by a perusal of the enclosed “Correspondence” [printed privately; confidential]. To my last letter I have received no other reply than that Mr. Maurice wishes the cause to pass into other hands. He had previously informed me that I was not to expect any explanation or retractation. He has, however, intimated to me his intention to lay before the council a printed reply.

* Mr. Ludlow’s objections were by no means the common ones. The letter, I think, helps to set forth the relationship between the two friends; but, like most of my father’s letters, it exaggerates the amount of disapproval of himself expressed in the letter, to which it is an answer.

‘It is, I hope, superfluous in me to express a hope that the professor may be allowed ample time for his defence.’

A copy of the correspondence alluded to by Dr. Jelf was laid upon the table.

The following letter dated October 12, 1853, from Professor Maurice to the Principal, enclosing his reply to the final letter of the Principal, dated September 1853, was received.

‘21, Queen’s Square, Bloomsbury,
Wednesday evening, October 12, 1853.

‘DEAR MR. PRINCIPAL,

‘I enclose the answer to your last letter, which reached me in its complete and official form between six and seven o’clock this evening. You are aware that the important passage in it respecting the Articles, together with all the concluding part of it, which most affects my character, was not sent to me till the middle of last week. Had I received the fragments of your letter sooner, I conceive I should not have acted respectfully if I had forwarded my reply, which has been in the printer’s hands for two days, before I had seen your charges in the shape in which you desire that they should be considered by the council.

‘I would respectfully request that this note may be laid before that body, as it explains a statement in your printed address, of which you have desired the secretary to send me a copy. That statement must, I think, lead the members of the council to suppose that I have refused or delayed to answer the charges which you have brought against me, or that I have not chosen to address my answer to you.

‘I wish certainly that the whole cause should pass into the hands of the council, who I am satisfied will deal fairly with it; but I think our correspondence will show that I have not declined to afford you any explanations which may enable you to understand my meaning, however you may dissent from it.

‘Copies of my letter will be sent to the secretary’s office, for the use of the council on Friday. Other copies will be sent by post to the members who may not be present on that day.

‘After deliberation it was ordered that copies of all these documents should be sent to every member of the council, and that the council should be specially summoned for two o’clock on Thursday, October 27, to take the same into consideration; no other business to be brought forward. The Principal requested that should the council think fit to require from him any explanation beyond that contained in the pamphlet, they would kindly permit Professor Maurice to be present at the time of his making such statement.’

J. W. CUNNINGHAM, Sec.

Extract from the Minutes of a Special Meeting of the Council held Thursday, October 27, 1853.

The letter from Dr. Jelf to the council dated October 8, enclosing his correspondence with Professor Maurice was read.

The letter from Professor Maurice to the Principal dated October 12, enclosing his answer to the Principal’s final letter, was read.

The secretary stated that in a letter to Professor Maurice he had requested him to be in attendance in case the council should wish to see him, and had also asked whether, in the event of the council not wishing to see him, he would desire to have an interview with them. Professor Maurice’s reply was read promising to be in attendance, and stating that, although he did not wish to make any formal application to the council for permission to be heard before them, there was one point on which he should perhaps be glad to make a very short explanation.

Professor Maurice being called in explained that having heard complaints made of the tone* in which he as a professor had addressed the Principal, in his "Answer to the Principal's final letter," he had written that letter as an answer to an indictment, and not as a letter to Dr. Jelf; and that if it was thought that there was anything wrong in the tone of that communication, he sincerely apologised for the same and asked the Principal to state what had always been his conduct at King's College.

Dr. Jelf cordially accepted Professor Maurice's explanation and bore high testimony to the uniform courteousness of his conduct towards himself, as well as to his unvarying attention to his classes, and zeal for the college.

After long and anxious deliberation the following resolutions were moved and seconded:

The council having taken into consideration an essay lately published by the Reverend Frederick Maurice, Professor of Divinity in King's College, and also a correspondence between the Principal and the professor on the subject of the said essay, and having been informed by Professor Maurice that he does not wish to make any statement in addition to his "Answer to the Principal's final letter," resolve

1. That in their judgment the opinions set forth and the doubts expressed in the said essay, and re-stated in the said answer as to certain points of belief regarding the future punishment of the wicked and the final issues of the day of judgment, are of dangerous tendency, and calculated to unsettle the minds of the theological students of King's College.
2. That the council feel it to be their painful duty to declare that the continuance of Professor Maurice's connection with the college as one of its professors would be seriously detrimental to its usefulness.
3. That the council, while it laments the necessity which con-

* It will be seen that the secretary has made nonsense of this. A letter of my father's, to be given immediately, will explain what he did say. The secretary's report of both Dr. Jelf's speeches and my father's is incorrect.

strains them to adopt this resolution, are bound in justice to Professor Maurice to express the sense which they entertain of the zealous and able manner in which he has discharged the duties of the two offices which he has held, and the attachment which he has at all times manifested to the college.

Whereupon the following amendment was moved and seconded :

That the Lord Bishop of London be requested to appoint competent theologians to institute an examination into the question how far the writings of Professor Maurice, or any propositions contained in them, which have been brought under the [notice of the] * council, are conformable to or at variance with the three creeds and the formularies of the Church of England, and to make a report thereupon, and that the Lord Bishop be requested to communicate the results of this examination to the council.

The amendment being put from the Chair, was lost upon a division.

The original propositions were then put and carried.

‘ MY DEAR JULIUS, ‘ 21, Queen’s Square, October 28, 1853.

‘ Your kindness in sending me the letter which I return prepared me for the decision of the council yesterday. Georgina has kindly written it out for me. You will see that it contains not only my dismissal, but a direct censure on the book. The last resolution is merely taken (I presume) from the common forms in the secretary’s office, which are used on such occasions.

‘ As the resolutions left me in doubt whether I should continue my lectures to the end of the term or suspend them at once, I was obliged to ask the Principal’s decision on that point. He determined at once that I was not to appear again before

* Whether these words are in the original or not I do not know. They are not in the copy sent me. By a curious accident the secretary has made nonsense of every passage which he had to reduce to writing, spoken in a sense friendly to my father.

either of my classes. It was very foolish, but I confess I felt this sentence much more than the previous one. I went before the council to make an explanation, which I had wished to make, respecting the alleged rudeness of my last letter to the Principal. I stated, that I had told the Principal beforehand, that I must regard that letter, though addressed to me, as an indictment against me; that when I answered it I should consider the characters of principal and professor as merged in those of accuser and accused. I said that if I had seemed to write a theological treatise instead of merely replying to a charge, I did so because the Principal had given that form to his letter. I said that if I had, under these circumstances, used any language which could seem disrespectful to the Principal or to them, I was heartily sorry for it, and I asked the Principal to tell the council whether he had any reason to complain of me for want of respect or subordination during the eight years I had served under him. He therefore made a very flattering and handsome speech respecting me, and said that if he had used any expressions in his letter not involving some great truth which caused me pain, he regretted it (I had referred to some personal allusions which I had carefully passed over in my reply, that I might not give so great a subject a personal character). I then spoke of his allusion to the other tenets of the Anabaptists—which he introduced, after the letter had gone to the press, as a special correction, and sent me notice of it. I said that I certainly believed he did mean by those words to revive the charges which had been brought against me two years ago in the ‘Quarterly Review,’ of which the council had I thought acquitted me, and that I felt such an insinuation or such an accusation to be ungenerous and unfair. He solemnly disclaimed any intention of the kind, regretted that his words would bear that construction, and defended himself about the Record nearly in the terms he had used in his letter to me. Then I withdrew. The bishop, who was in the chair, looked more cold and stern than usual, Harrison more like marble. The others I scarcely saw, except Dr. Watson, who covered his face with his hands, and who, I felt, was sympathising with me. Greene was there. I will not say that his letter did not, at first, cause me much pain; afterwards I was thankful for it. I see it is not to philosophers, however intelligent or accomplished, that I must appeal. He may sit in his study, drink his claret, edit the 'Logosophie,' and talk of a "one probation" for the multitudes who have never been taught the difference between right and wrong. The humble preacher of the Gospel who sees men perishing cannot talk so; nor the medical man who is actually living among men, not speculating about men. Coleridge would not; for, besides being a philosopher, he was a penitent, who knew that, though his crimes might be less than those of open reprobates, his sins were greater, and prayed, God be merciful to me! To these I confidently turn, and I know that they will understand me sooner or later.

'I wish I could show you a statement which the Bishop of Oxford, objecting to many points in my letter, and not pledging himself to agreement with me, drew up, of what he conceived to be my doctrine; it was as lucid and beautiful as anything I ever read. I accepted it unreservedly, but, at his request, I returned him his letter that he might make use of it. I hope I shall recover it.'

* * * * *

'Captain Sterling has proposed to me to give up the guardianship of his nieces into our hands. I have accepted the trust. It has been a very rapid business, only settled finally on Wednesday night. The responsibility is very serious, though it will not last many years, except in H.'s case; still I am most thankful that it is to be so.'

Mr. W. E. Gladstone to Lord Lyttelton.

'MY DEAR LYTTELTON,

October 29, 1853.

'The subject of your letter is not new to me. I remained in town last Thursday in order to attend the council of K. C. and, as far as I could, to see fair play. I was afraid of a very precipitate proceeding, and I regret to say my fears have been verified. The motion carried was the Bishop of London's, but I am bound to say he was quite willing to have waived it for another course, and the proceeding is due to a body of laymen, chiefly lords. The motion carried is to the effect that the statements on certain points contained in Maurice's last essay are of a dangerous character, and that his connection with the theology of the college ought not to continue. I moved as an amendment that the bishop be requested to appoint competent theologians, who should personally examine how far the statements of Mr. Maurice were conformable to, or at variance with, the three creeds and the formularies of the Church of England, and should make a report upon them, and that the bishop should be requested to communicate with the council.

‘For myself, I find in different parts of what Maurice has written things that I cannot, and that I am quite certain the council had not, been able to reconcile. This consideration alone seemed to me to show that they were not in a condition to proceed with a definitive judgment. I do not feel sufficiently certain what his view as a whole may be, even if I were otherwise competent to judge whether it is within or beyond the latitude allowed by the Church in this matter. And independently of all this, I thought that even decency demanded of the council, acting perforce in a judicial capacity, that they should let the accused person know in the most distinct terms for what he was dismissed, and should show that they had dismissed him, if at all, only after using much greater pains to ascertain that his opinions were in real contrariety to some Article of the faith. I also cherished the hope, founded on certain parts of what he has said, that his friends might be able in the mean time to arrange some formula concordiæ which might avert the scandal and mischief of the dismissal. Sir J. Patteson, Sir B. Brodie, and Mr. Greene supported the amendment, but the majority went the other way, and much am I grieved at it. I am not inclined to abate the dogmatic profession of the Church—on the contrary, nothing would induce me to surrender the smallest fraction of it; but while jealous of its infraction in any particular, I am not less jealous of the obtrusion of any private or local opinion into the region of dogma; and, above all, I hold that there should be as much rigour in a trial of this kind, irrespective of the high character and distinguished powers of the person charged in this particular case, as if he were indicted for murder.’

Mr. E. B. Denison, to F. D. M.

‘The Castle, Eccleshall, 31 October, 1853.

‘MY DEAR MAURICE,

‘By the bishop’s leave I write to tell you that he was not at the meeting of the K. C. council last Thursday, solely in consequence of the secretary’s neglect in not sending him the notice; and that having read your book, and the correspondence between you and the principal, he has great doubts whether he should have concurred in the decision of the council. He is unwilling to speak more strongly without having heard what other members of the council might have to say: but that, of course, could only have affected his judgment on the question of the expediency of getting rid of you in deference to external clamour, and not his opinion on your theology.

‘He wrote to Cunningham last Wednesday to ask when the meeting would be, in order that he might make his arrangements to be able to attend; and he was surprised to receive an answer saying that the meeting had taken place the day it was written (Thursday), and that the clerks assured the secretary the notice had been sent to the bishop. The next day Cunningham wrote again, certainly a very remarkable letter: for he says, by way of excuse for the letter not having arrived here, that, the bishop having some time ago desired that his K. C. letters might be sent to 39, Harley Street, where, as you know, he lived until this year during the time when bishops are in London, the notice was sent there; but he adds—“Knowing that your Lordship was at Eccleshall, I gave special orders that the two pamphlets should not be sent to Harley Street, because I feared they might not be forwarded."

'The said secretary also expresses his opinion that the very existence of the college was at stake in the decision.

'You may make known in any way you like, that I have told you all this. And seeing that the Bishop of Lichfield * is the very man who above all others ought to have been specially invited to be present at such a meeting, I think these facts will not be without weight in the opinion of impartial people.'

Sir Benjamin Brodie to Archdeacon Hare.

'Briscome, Betchworth, Surrey, November 2, 1853.

'MY DEAR ARCHDEACON,

'There was a pretty full meeting of the council on Thursday, but the only clerical members present were the Bishop of London and Archdeacon Harrison.

'One member of the council proposed the dismissal of Professor Maurice. The Bishop of London gave it as his opinion that this could not be done without giving reasons for doing so, and read a paper which he had prepared, having previously stated his opinion that Mr. Maurice was preaching dangerous doctrines, contrary to those of the Church of England. Mr. Gladstone stated that this was a dangerous mode of proceeding, and suggested that the first thing to be done was to appoint a committee of competent persons to consider whether the doctrines taught by Professor Maurice were improper or not (I forget the words, but this was the substance). Mr. Gladstone's suggestion was supported by Patteson, Greene, and myself, and by no one else; and I took the opportunity of stating that the matter was much more important than it seemed to be in the eyes of the council; that the clergy themselves were by no means unanimous in their opinion on the subject, and that the great mass of the laity would be found to agree with

* He had been the former Principal of King's College.

Professor Maurice. A long discussion followed, not on Mr. Gladstone's motion (for really the other members of the council did not seem to think that it was worthy of consideration at all), but about the wording of the Bishop of London's resolution. I stayed two hours, and then finding that there was not the smallest chance of my doing any good, and it being really a matter of necessity that I should leave London by a particular train, there being none afterwards until a late hour, I went away. I understand that after my departure the Bishop of London's proposition was carried as a matter of course, and that it was somewhat to this effect,—[as already given.]

‘I own that this seems to be the most unwise and impotent conclusion at which the council could have arrived: and I greatly wonder that so clever a person as the Bishop of London is, should not have sheltered himself, as he first proposed to do, by assuming (as Dr. Jelf has done) that Professor Maurice's doctrine was contrary to that of the Church of England, instead of taking on himself to determine what that doctrine ought to be. By the first mode of proceeding he would have confined the discussion very much to the clergy and professed theologians, but as it is he has thrown it open to the whole world. If he loves discussion he will have enough of it; for I am much mistaken if this affair does not produce more controversy, and more heart-burning, and more unchristian feelings than either that of Hampden or that of Gorham. I must also say that I am not a little vexed with Professor Maurice that he should have brought us into this difficulty. He must have felt that in his situation at King's College he was doing a very great deal of good; he knew the kind of person with whom he had to deal, and it would have been very much better if he had avoided connecting himself with the Christian Socialists, and discussing questions on which it was plain that persons having great influence in the college would be at variance with him. This may be called worldly wisdom, but the fact is that a little worldly wisdom is necessary to enable any of us to do good in this world. I attribute to him no other blame than this, at the same time that I most fully appreciate his abilities,' &c.

Mr. W. E. Gladstone to Sir B. Brodie.

'MY DEAR SIR, 'Hawarden, North Wales, November 3, 1853.

'When I saw you quit the room at King's College on Thursday last, I not only assumed, as I now know, that you had a sufficient cause, but I was also aware that my amendment could not be carried, and that it had received at your hands what, under the circumstances, was alone of importance, namely, your express approval and support.

'Had the matter been one of secondary consequence, and had the objections to the course taken by the majority been of a lower order, I should not have pressed my opinion. But as the case actually stood, I felt and feel that the proper course was clear, alike in policy and justice. For even assuming that Mr. Maurice might rightly be dismissed for some of his statements if they stood alone, yet they in point of fact stand in connection with others, by which they are either practically overthrown, or at the least essentially modified. It was not just that the council should carry the matter to a final issue upon this conflicting evidence, without having made every effort to bring it into a state of congruity with itself. Justice also demanded, as I think, that the issue should be brought to a form much more pointed than that of a bare reference to the statements contained in a certain essay. I have no doubt many of the majority (but not all) would say, in laying down conditions of teaching, we did not lay down conditions of communion: but this hand-over-hand mode of dealing with such questions will never do, and I sorrowfully agree with you in anticipating much and prolonged mischief from the measure of last Thursday. It was matter of the greatest satisfaction to me to find myself in agreement with you, and with other persons of so much weight.'

The letter to the secretary from the Bishop of Lichfield had been in the secretary's hands on October 27, the day of the meeting. It was not read to the council, though in it he, the former Principal of the college, stated that he had been carefully studying the whole subject, and that he was very anxious to be present at the meeting of the council, which he presumed would be held on the subject.

A letter from Mr. Anderson, the Preacher of Lincoln's Inn, to the Principal, was in the hands of the latter at the time of the meeting. In that letter Mr. Anderson stated that, to his great regret, he was prevented by private trouble from being present at the meeting of October 27, but that he was convinced that it was impossible for the council to arrive at a definite conclusion on that day with respect to the difficult subject submitted to them.

The Dean of St. Paul's, Milman, had misapprehended the summons, having taken for granted that the council could not proceed with such haste as they exhibited.

These facts are the more important because Mr. Gladstone now expresses his absolute conviction that had it been known to the council that the letters from the Bishop of Lichfield and Mr. Anderson had been received, the majority would have accepted his proposal for further consideration.

It must, however, be stated that though Mr. Anderson's letter had not been made known to the council, it certainly and probably the Bishop of Lichfield's had been mentioned to some members of the majority. The question of Christian Socialism had been carefully connected with the one before the council, by the Record throughout an attack, which had been continued almost without intermission for nine months. The leading members of the majority, Lord Radstock and Sir R. Inglis, were the same men who had in the previous year been bitterly annoyed by the result which had followed a reference of my father's writings to a clerical committee. That committee, called together to anathematise, had blessed instead. It is of course possible that the Bishop of London, whom Mr. Gladstone in his letter of October 29, represents as wavering, might have been unable to resist the argument in behalf of delay which these letters, if publicly known, would have put into Mr. Gladstone's hands, and as the members present were in all fifteen, it is possible that the evidence that seven members of the council took Mr. Gladstone's view of the proper course to be pursued, might have induced others to think it unavoidable to delay arriving at a final decision. But it is practically certain that the motive for securing a vote at once whilst they were sure of a majority, which chiefly actuated the more strenuous of the theological lay lords, was the fear of that very thing which made delay seem the only righteous course to Mr. Gladstone—the possibility of a favourable verdict as the result of a judicial inquiry by a body of clergy; nor, considering that the Bishop of London could hardly have avoided appointing the clerical members of the council, can their fears be considered to have been groundless.

The "formula concordiæ," which Mr. Gladstone desired, had, as it has been seen, been actually drawn up by the Bishop of Oxford. My father had unreservedly accepted it. It will be found on pp. 210–213, Vol. II., of Bishop Wilberforce's life. Bishop Wilberforce, a former member of the council of King's College, had, partly in that capacity, partly as a brother Bishop, forwarded both his own letter and my father's to Bishop Blomfield with an expression of his belief that they had an important bearing "on the question which is to come before the council of King's College to-morrow." Bishop Blomfield made no mention whatever to the council of his having received the "formula concordiæ" or my father's acceptance of it. Neither did he state that he had received a letter from Bishop Wilberforce expressing his own belief "that Professor Maurice is entirely orthodox," and urging that precisely the proposal of Mr. Gladstone should be adopted, viz. that the council of King's College should appoint a committee of divines. That these various suppressions helped to secure Bishop Blomfield's object at the moment is beyond question. How far they will redound to his honour hereafter is a question not for me to determine. He had, as a stranger to my father put it at the time, already established a reputation for "building churches by public subscription, and sacrificing his clergy to popular clamour."

'MY DEAR JULIUS, '21, Queen's Square, November 5, 1853.

'Your letter is altogether in accordance with my feelings. If I followed them I should at once send in my resignation as you recommend. The Bishop of Oxford and Baron Alderson were so strong against this course that I have with some hesitation drawn up a letter, in what I suppose to be their sense. I send you a copy of it. Could you let me have it back by return of post? A letter must go in before the next meeting of council (on Friday), and I think perhaps I had better print some copies and send one to each member a day or two before the meeting. If you do not like it, and still think an unqualified resignation best, I shall be greatly disposed to adopt your plan. Of course I shall resign instantly, if the council will declare that they do not meddle with the theology of the matter, but merely think my continuance in the college generally inexpedient. They will then put themselves in the right position, from which the unhappy feebleness and temerity (qualities wonderfully combined in him) of the Bishop of London has drawn them.*

* It must of course be remembered that this is a private letter to a brother-in-law. I believe this is the only expression of irritation in any letter I have, and I give it because I am not trying to paint my father other than he was, but just as he was. The feeling, however, which prompts the expression is simply this: that the Bishop, whilst really yielding only to popular clamour, would not frankly acknowledge this. Had he done so my father would not only have been quite content to leave the college, but would never have attempted to resist that result, which he had anticipated from the first. But the Bishop—not liking simply to put the matter on the footing, on which, as a perusal of Dr. Jelf's previous letters from the time of his appointment as Principal, will show that it really stood always, namely one of pounds, shillings and pence, to the college—brought in the question of orthodoxy, whilst he evaded every means of arriving at a trial which would have satisfied a Court of Petty Larceny. The irritation, therefore, was not personal; but was felt against an effort at the suppression of truth; against a means by which popular or rather noisy clamour was treated as if it was in itself a righteous court of judgment.

‘I feel so deeply and unceasingly the importance of the question at issue, that I long to see the present accidents of it altogether ignored, and it gives me exceeding pain when the kindness of my friends gives even a tinge of personality to so great a controversy. How much interest it is exciting you may learn from the enclosed note, which is curious and interesting. I have a most interesting letter from Langley, and some most touching and gratifying from the students. I am going out to see if I can catch the Bishop of Oxford, but I am afraid he is fled. If not, I will tell you before post. I promised to send my letter to him before I sent it in. I think the course he recommends is likely to offend the Bishop of London and the Archbishop, and probably to bring me within their clutches; but if it is the right one, I must not mind that.’

The “curious and interesting” inclosure was as follows.

From Mr. F. J. Furnivall.

‘DEAR MR. MAURICE,

‘Thursday night.

‘I was at J. H. Parker’s at eight o’clock this evening, and the head shopman said the correspondence was not out, and they did not expect it before the end of the week; it was being printed at Oxford. I said, “Do you hear much about the matter?” the man said, “I’ve heard of nothing else the last day or two, either in the shop or out of it. You may depend upon it, sir, there are thousands taking the deepest interest in it. We don’t know what other points the dispute is on, but if it’s only about everlasting punishment, I’ve had it from all the clergy I’ve seen, from the archdeacon to the curate this day, that it isn’t a Church doctrine, and if they dismiss Mr. Maurice for this only, it is most unjust; but, almost all think there must be something more, a general charge of Socinianism or something of that sort; if it’s only the eternal punishment, there’ll be thousands sympathising with Mr. Maurice. The people we serve are all High, not bound up with Mr. Maurice, as J. W. Parker’s people are, and nine out of ten are clergymen, but they'll all be with Mr. Maurice: they all say it isn't a Church doctrine; and if you take the Bible and common sense to judge by, why sir, it's the most abominable and horrible doctrine ever preached."

'The man volunteered all this, and a good deal more, to my occasional, "ah, indeed!" before he asked where he was to send the pamphlet.

'Coming from Jelf's publishing place, I was glad to hear this report.'

Sir B. Brodie to Archdeacon Hare.

'14, Savile Row, Friday.

'I have just time to say that there has been a meeting of the council, at which the Bishop of Lichfield, Dean of St. Paul's, and Mr. Anderson were present, and expressed their great regret at the late proceedings of the council as to Mr. Maurice; at the same time they seemed to be of opinion that the resolution having been once passed could not now be rescinded. They were all three quite in earnest on the subject. An unfortunate combination had led to their being all absent on the former occasion.'

It may be well to notice that Mr. Gladstone, and others of those who had voted with him, were unable to be present on this second occasion. The decision of a body such as the council of King's College is, of necessity, usually determined by the men of least occupation, who can best afford the time to attend.

*Extract from the Minutes of the Council, held
November 11, 1853.

The following letter from the Principal on the subject of the discontinuance of Mr. Maurice's lectures, was received and ordered to be entered on the minutes.

'MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN, 'King's College, November 11, 1853.

'It is my duty to inform you that on the evening of the day on which the special council was held, I received a letter from Professor Maurice asking me whether, in compliance with the minute of the council (which declares that the continuance of Professor Maurice's connection with the college as one of its professors would be seriously detrimental to its usefulness), "it was my wish that he should absent himself from his lectures on the following day, or whether he should continue them till a successor was appointed."

* There is much in these minutes which is irrelevant to my purpose; but I am bound by the resolution of the council, already referred to, not to pick and choose, and there are in them some points of considerable importance. I print in small type the unimportant parts.

'I inclose the original letter dated 21, Queen Square, Bloomsbury, October 27, 1853, with a request that it may be placed upon your minutes of this day.

'Considering that the act of the council of that day was final: knowing that it was considered final by the members present; believing that it would neither be conducive to the interests of the college, nor consistent with what is due to the feelings of Mr. Maurice, that a gentleman on whom so severe a censure has been pronounced, should continue to deliver his lectures as usual; I thought it better to decline the implied offer of lecturing till the appointment of a successor, and (to use Mr. Maurice's own words), in compliance with the minutes of the council, to desire that he should discontinue his lectures at once.

'By the kindness of Dr. McCaul, and of Professor Hall and Professor Browne, who volunteered in their respective departments to give their aid to the college in this emergency, I have been enabled to make completely satisfactory arrangements for the instruction of the classes, both in ecclesiastical history and in English literature and history. And I beg leave to call the special attention of the council to the kindness of the three professors and their loyal devotedness to the welfare and the efficiency of the college, of which they have so long been distinguished ornaments.'

The following is the letter from Mr. Maurice referred to in the preceding:

'MY DEAR SIR,

'21, Queen's Square, Bloomsbury.

'The secretary has communicated to me the minute of the council held this day, which declares that the continuance of my connection with the college as one of its professors would be seriously detrimental to its usefulness.

'I merely write to ask you whether, in compliance with this minute, it is your wish that I should absent myself from my lectures to-morrow or whether I should continue them till a successor is appointed. I send this note by a special messenger. May I request the kindness of an answer by him?'

After reading these letters the council resolved that they entirely approved of the Principal's conduct with reference to the suspension of Mr. Maurice's lectures, and they ordered that their cordial thanks should be conveyed to each of the three professors, Rev. Dr. McCaul, Rev. T. G. Hall, and Rev. R. W. Browne, for the kindness with which they had placed their services at the disposal of the Principal in the emergency which had occurred, and for the loyal devotedness to the welfare and efficiency of the college which they had manifested.

The secretary laid before the council the three following letters from the Rev. F. D. Maurice, those dated October 28 (A), and November 10 (B), addressed to himself, the latter enclosing that dated (C) November 7 addressed to the council.'

'(A) DEAR SIR,

'21, Queen's Square, October 28, 1853.

- 'I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated yesterday, which contains a copy of some resolutions passed at the last meeting of the council. As these resolutions did not state at what time the council wished me to suspend my work as professor in the college, I was obliged to request the decision of the Principal on the question whether I should continue the lectures which I had commenced and which were to prepare the students for the examination at Christmas, or should not appear again before either of my classes.
- 'The Principal desired me to discontinue my courses at once. I request that this fact may be notified to the council, since without such authority I should have conceived that I was violating an engagement to the students by absenting myself from the college.
- 'The council do not refer in their minutes, which you have communicated to me, to any arrangements which they have made respecting the publication of my correspondence with the Principal. I presume I may leave the publication of that portion of it which was printed under his direction to himself. I will publish my own final letter; but in case of any considerable delay, I shall feel myself authorised to publish the whole.'

'(B) SIR,

'21, Queen's Square, Bloomsbury, November 10, 1853.

- 'I enclose a letter addressed to the council of King's College, which I request you to lay before them at their meeting to-morrow.
- 'That there may be no mistake from handwriting, and that each member of the council may have a copy of the letter, I have directed that it should be printed. Fifty copies shall be sent to the office early to-morrow morning. I have referred in the accompanying letter to a note which I have added to the letter I addressed some weeks ago to the Principal; copies of that letter as it is now published shall be sent to the office with those of the letter to the council. I will request that they also may be laid before the council.'

To the Council of King's College.

'21, Queen's Square, Bloomsbury, November 7, 1853.

'(C) MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

- 'I have received from the secretary of King's College a copy of certain resolutions respecting me which were adopted at the last meeting of the council.
- 'Under ordinary circumstances it would be my duty at once to resign offices which the legislative body of the college has declared that I cannot hold without serious detriment to its usefulness.

- ‘But the council is aware, and the public is now also aware, that certain definite charges have been brought against me by the Principal, upon the strength of which he asked that I should be excluded from my professorship. These charges amounted to a declaration that I had departed from the orthodox faith. He alleged, as his reasons for this grave charge, that I did not accept a meaning of the word “eternal” which he considered to be the only right one, and that I refused to draw certain consequences from that meaning, or to pronounce an opinion upon a subject on which the Articles of the Church of England have not pronounced one.
- ‘The decision of the council, as it avowedly takes cognizance of the opinions which I expressed on this subject in my ‘Theological Essays,’ and in my correspondence with the Principal, can be understood to amount to nothing less than a condemnation of me upon the grounds which are expressed in the Principal’s letter. The council must be deemed to have accepted the propositions in that letter, and to require that all its professors should accept them likewise.
- ‘The Principal evidently shares this opinion. When I wrote to inquire whether my lectures were to be continued till my successors were appointed, he answered that I had better discontinue them from the day on which the resolutions of the council were passed. He pronounced this decision though he had officially commanded me to be present at the opening of the term and to commence my usual courses, retracting an unofficial letter in which he had recommended me to ask for leave of absence. I submit that a person ordinarily so courteous to the professors of the college, and so tender of the interests of the students, would not have thus summarily suspended a teacher whom, with a full knowledge of his opinions, he had invited to be a lecturer in the theological department, and who had served the college in the other department for thirteen years—that he would not have interrupted the studies of the term and forced me to break an implicit engagement with those who are taking part in them—if he had not believed that he was executing an ecclesiastical sentence upon a convicted heretic.

‘I cannot, my lords and gentlemen, believe that, great as are the privileges which the right reverend bench has conceded to the Principal of King’s College, their lordships, the bishops, ever intended to give him an authority superior to their own, superior to that of the Articles by which they are bound; I cannot think that they wished to constitute him and the council arbiters of the theology of the English Church. Such a claim would be as alarming, I apprehend, to the public as to our ecclesiastical rulers. If some parents have been suspicious of the influence which I might exercise over their sons, I believe that there are few parents in England who will not complain that the college has departed from its original principle when it gives such a scope to the private judgment of its chief officer, or even to the judgment of the body which manages its affairs.

‘I think it due, then, to my own character as a clergyman, to the interests of the college, and to the liberties of the English Church, that I should call upon the council, if they pronounce a theological sentence upon me at all, to declare what Article of our faith condemns my teaching. I conjure them not to use any phrases in condemning me which they would reject as loose and vague if the property or the life of a fellow-citizen were in question. Whether I have unsettled the faith of my pupils by giving an interpretation of the word “eternal,” which I had maintained to be true—and especially important for students in divinity—before I was asked to join the theological department, the after lives of those pupils must determine. But if I have violated any law of the Church, that law can be at once pointed out—the nature of the transgression can be defined without any reference to possible tendencies and results. It is this justice, and not any personal favour, my lords and gentlemen, which I now request at your hands.

‘P.S.—I have requested the secretary to lay before the council some copies of my letter to the Principal, to which I have added some notes. I would respectfully call the attention of the council to the Note B., page 31, of the pamphlet.’

After reading this letter the council decided that they did not think it necessary to enter further into the subject, and declared the two chairs held by Mr. Maurice in the college to be vacant.

CHAPTER VI.

"Now that which especially distinguishes a high order of man from a low order of man, that which constitutes human goodness, human greatness, human nobleness, is surely not the degree of enlightenment with which men pursue their own advantage; but it is self-forgetfulness—it is self-sacrifice—it is the disregard of personal pleasure, personal indulgence, personal advantages remote or present, because some other line of conduct is more right."—Froude, The Science of History.

1853-1854—PUBLIC OPINION DECLARES ITSELF AGAINST ITS WORSHIPPERS—F. D. M. RESIGNS HIS POSITION AT QUEEN'S COLLEGE, AND OFFERS TO RESIGN LINCOLN'S INN—CAUSES LEADING TO THE FOUNDING OF THE WORKING-MEN'S COLLEGE—DR. CANDLISH'S ATTACK—SERMONS ON SACRIFICE—LONG LETTER ON THE OCCUPATIONS OF THE FUTURE STATE—VIEW OF RELATION OF BUNSEN'S LINE OF THOUGHT TO HIS OWN.

BETWEEN the first and the second meeting of the Council public attention had been attracted to these proceedings. It was the time immediately preceding the Crimean War. Yet, despite the absorbing nature of public events, the newspapers not only in London but throughout the country teemed with articles on the subject of "King's College and Mr. Maurice."

Mr. Sharp, whose father had been a friend of my father's, informs me that, meeting my father soon after October 27, the date of the first Council, he (Mr. Sharp) told him that an article warmly espousing his cause had appeared in the Daily News. "Indeed!" replied my father, as his eyes filled with tears. "I did not think there was a newspaper in London that would have said a word in my favour." Both he and the majority of the Council had utterly miscalculated the effect of their action upon public opinion. The forecast of Archdeacon Hare's letter on p. 184 was accurately verified. The Council were as little likely to be pleased with their admirers as with their denouncers. The Reasoner, Mr. Holyoake's paper, put forth a warm eulogy upon Dr. Jelf; the Inquirer, the organ of the Unitarians, in less savage terms, but also from avowed hostility to the Church of England, took the same line. The most powerful attack on the Council appeared in a letter in the Guardian, by a man who had never seen or spoken to my father.* Several other newspapers, notably, the Spectator,

* Dr. Jelf's mind apparently belonged to that rather numerous class which take public opinion as a kind of conscience. He did not so much yield to public opinion as change his own actual view of right and wrong according as the wind set at the time. He evidently had had no doubt at all that public opinion would approve without hesitation when he advertised in the Record what he was doing. He very soon became aware that, at least as to his action in regard to the Record, men's feelings were pretty much what were expressed after the first meeting of the Council in this letter in the Guardian (signed O. P.): "It ought to be known that the accusation which has procured this condemnation from the Council, was first made by that newspaper, gathering many vulgar and scurrilous accidents from such a vehicle of communication. And the readers of that print must have been much struck, as your readers no doubt also were, to know that Dr. Jelf, a dignitary of the Church and Principal of King's College, thought it consistent with his position and his dignity to insert an advertisement in that journal, reassuring it by the statement that Mr. Maurice's orthodoxy was under consideration, and affording room for the hope that the utmost requirements of the Record would ere long be satisfied."

From the time that Dr. Jelf became aware of this feeling, he was most anxious to apologise for this part of his conduct. His letters to my father on the subject are almost pathetic. "I despise the Record," he wrote to Bishop Wilberforce. Especially he took it almost as a wrong that my father should have said in one of his letters that if Dr. Jelf should think proper to carry on the controversy in the columns of the Record, my father must decline to reply. But Dr. Jelf took no step more public than his apology before the Council, to deprive himself of such advantages as he had thought it his duty to seek for the College by his submission to the Record.

One of the points most insisted on in much of the private correspondence of this time is the degraded position in which a college places itself by entering into a commercial calculation as to whether or no it can afford to resist a wave of unpopularity. This feeling was most strongly expressed in some of the letters from public school-masters. It was inevitable that the contrast with Arnold's bold facing of a somewhat similar, though, no doubt, not so fierce, a storm should strike many men.

the Daily News, and the Globe, all of which had been till then in strong opposition to him as the leader of Christian Socialism, indignantly denounced the action of the Council.

Mr. Ludlow, with his usual devotion to my father when in trouble, prepared and published a careful statement of "the facts" of the whole case. This was largely read throughout the country. On my father's writing to offer to resign his position as Chaplain of Lincoln's Inn, he received a most cordial reply from the Benchers, expressing their wish that he should remain. As he also received an informal intimation from Bishop Blomfield that the Bishop did not wish to take any further step, he had no occasion to carry out his intention of refusing to claim the protection afforded him by his position at Lincoln's Inn.

The manifestation of public feeling in the press was as nothing to that which was made to my father personally. Letters poured in from all parts of the country, many of them from people he had never heard of before. Almost every one of these letters represents a whole circle of friends. Almost all his correspondents write of letters received by them from others, expressing a sense of personal love and indebtedness, gratitude for light where darkness had been before. There came also more public demonstrations. The post, one morning, brought a letter containing the Poet Laureate's lines of sympathy, and the invitation, to visit his young godson, which Whewell declared to be the most perfect specimen of its kind in the language. There came also in succession an address from the co-operating working-men of London to their President, an address from forty Dissenters of all denominations,* an address and separate and enthusiastic letters from his old pupils at King's College, an address from Queen's College, part of a correspondence published at the time, which records the facts as to his action in relation to that body; and finally an address from the members of the congregation of Lincoln's Inn. I give some of these in the order of their dates, not for the sake of the merely complimentary portions, but because each of them has a special characteristic of its own, and contains matter that will be found valuable in itself. For similar reasons I give his answers.

* I am only prevented from publishing his answer to this address by its length. In itself the letter is among the most valuable of his answers.

To his late Pupils at King's College.

'21 Queen Square, Bloomsbury, November 3, 1853.

'MY DEAR FRIENDS,

'I thank you very heartily for your affectionate parting words, which have given me very great pleasure. If I thought they implied the least disrespect to the authorities of the college, I could not have acknowledged them, however personally grateful they might have been. But I know that you have no such feelings, and that you will be as earnest and faithful in all your college duties as you have been in my lecture-room. May God bless you each and all and every one with whom I have been connected in this work which is now ended.'

To Rev. J. Compton.

'21 Queen Square, Bloomsbury, November 5, 1853.

'I did not write to you before, because I really was afraid I should confuse you by my tidings. The decree has now gone forth against me; but it is not a decree of the English Church, not even of the Bishops. It is an act of private judgment; my appeal throughout has been to the formularies of the Church. I am condemned by those especially who wish the religious newspapers to be the great court of ecclesiastical appeal.

'But do not, I beseech you, think of such a trifle as this. The loss of pupils who have been throughout attentive and affectionate, and never showed their affection more than now, is of course a trying one; but if it leads other men to think more earnestly, deeply, and devoutly, the compensation is enormous. I can say confidently that I counted the cost. I said when I finished that particular essay, "This will end my work at King's College." I have therefore had no surprise worthy to complain of. But I have had rewards that I did not dream of; tokens of sympathy, proofs that words spoken in weakness have had a power not their own, which have surprised me more than I can tell. Your own letters have been a very great help and encouragement to me. And I am sure that nothing which happens to me, if it be a thousand times worse than this, ought to shake you in any one hope you have cherished, or to give you a moment's doubt that the Church is standing upon a rock, even if the sand which has drifted over it sometimes looks as if it were the only foundation.'

'21 Queen Square, November 11, 1853.

'MY DEAR LANGLEY,

' . . . My censure has a quasi-ecclesiastical character from the connection of the Bishop of London with the Council of King's College, and from the fact that he proposed the resolution against me; but it is not a decree of the Church; it will not be if he should follow it up, as he may or may not do, by suspending me from my ministerial duties. I appeal to the Articles against their glorification of private judgment. They cannot drive me out of the Church of England; for it is not to drive any one out to make him incapable of receiving the revenues which are accidentally attached to it. Those revenues may be turned to sectarian uses, wholly turned, perhaps, some day; but the Church will remain. That has been my reason for insisting so vehemently on the Articles and the Prayer Book as a protection against the religious newspapers. I have not changed my ground in the least, and I believe this event will lead numbers to understand it who have been perplexed hitherto. Although, therefore, I would by no means urge you to take any sudden step which might be more like a renunciation of the position you have, than the acquisition of a safer ground, I do believe that ultimately all that has happened and may happen to me will show you more clearly that there is a Church of England, and that you may claim your place in it.'

F. D. M. to the Committee of Education (consisting of the Professors) of Queen's College.

'21 Queen Square, November 15, 1853.

'MY DEAR FRIENDS,

'You will allow me, I am sure, to dispense with ordinary formalities in bidding farewell to the Committee of Education, with which I have worked so happily for nearly six years.

'When I was dismissed from King's College I felt that I might subject you to serious misrepresentations from the public, and, perhaps, to a rebuke from the Visitor, if I remained among you. I did not, however, feel that I should be justified in resigning altogether, and I understood it to be the wish of many, perhaps most of you, that I should not. I took this course: I announced to the deputy-chairman, that if I was elected unanimously by the Council, I would continue to lecture in the college on moral philosophy and English literature, but if there was any dissentient voice I should act as if I were rejected. I said, at the same time, that under no circumstances could I retain the office of chairman of your committee. It seemed to me a very different thing to be a teacher in the college, and to represent the body of its teachers before the Council and the Visitor.

'It has been announced to me that a majority of the Council, at their meeting yesterday, decided that I should continue to hold my lectureships, but that there were dissentients who stated their reasons for thinking that I ought to be dismissed. I am, therefore, bound in honour to fulfil the promise I gave in my letter to Mr. Nicolay, which, at my own request, he communicated to the Council.

'But were I free from that obligation I should still feel that I could not be the one teacher in the college upon whom a stigma has been fixed, the single person who could be presented to the Visitor under a protest from members of the Council, to whose opinion he would probably attach great weight. I should be putting myself in a dishonourable position:

what is of much more importance, I should be bringing you, who have kindly given my name a prominence to which it was not entitled, into unfair suspicion.

‘There is, therefore, but one course open to me. I am thankful that the sharp pain which it costs me to sever a connection so affectionate and cordial as ours has been, will not be increased by the reflection that the college will be a sufferer. Previously to the appointment of a council, even a single withdrawal might have shaken you; now, I trust you will become stronger every day. My moral philosophy class, though it has increased this term, is still the smallest in the college. In literature, I was merely acting as Strettell’s substitute. The office of chairman you will be able to supply admirably, even if the zeal and efficiency of the excellent deputy did not make it now, as it has always been, a very easy office. What a pleasant one your confidence has made it I do not trust myself to say even in a letter; I had not courage to tell you in person this evening.

‘I wish I could leave behind me some token of my affection to an institution which I have had the great honour and privilege of watching from its birth. I fear I must be content with asking you to consider my share of the fund raised for paying for the charter, and for discharging our obligations to the Governesses’ Society, as the property of the college.

‘Ever, my dear friends, affectionately yours.’

Answer of the Committee by their Chairman, Professor Trench.

‘Queen’s College, November 29, 1853.

‘DEAR MR. MAURICE,

‘The circumstances detailed in your letter sufficiently convince us that you did not leave us while it was possible for you, consistently with your own high sense of delicacy and honour, to remain; and we are grateful for the self-denial which retained you with us so long. If in one respect it increases, in another it diminishes our regret at this your separation from us, that your resignation, both of the chair at our committee and your professorships, was voluntary. And now there is nothing which need hinder us from saying freely, and without reserve, how great the reverence and affection are with which we as a body, and each one in particular, regard you. Recent experience has shown us that in saying this, we express not our own feelings only, but those of the pupils, and of all connected with the college, wherein you have exercised an influence deep and lasting, which they only can rightly measure who have had the opportunity of witnessing its operations, and observing how many were the subjects of it, besides those who had the happiness of being your immediate pupils.

‘It is indeed a grievous blending of sorrow with joy, when amid the congratulations natural on the completion of a long and tedious work, on the fulfilment, after four vexatious years, of a hope, which it was you who first bid us to entertain, this very fulfilment is the signal for your loss. At such a moment that which we would more willingly have said to others, we must say to yourself—namely, that you were our guide during all that period of doubt and uncertainty; it was your foresight and moderation which prevented difficulties from arising; by your firmness, difficulties, when unavoidable, were met and overcome; your wisdom has been throughout the best bond of our counsels.

‘Nor does it fail to be some satisfaction to us, as your letter assures us it is also to you, that you have, before withdrawing from the work, set the key-stone to the arch, that you have left this college, the infancy of which you nurtured, with matured government and legalised authority, and may reflect hereafter that you have been the main instrument in securing for it the first charter which the Crown of Great Britain has ever granted solely for the furtherance of female education; with which event for the future your name must be indissolubly connected.

‘We accept^r with gratitude the generous donation which you have made^e to our funds. We trust that in some way or other your name may be permanently bound up with it, though it is not for us at present to say in what manner this result may be most effectually accomplished.

‘ And having received so many and so great favours from you, we yet cannot conclude without asking one favour more ; this namely, that, lest the circumstances which have compelled you now to leave us should continue to act, and make the separation final, you would allow us to perpetuate, not your memory only, but, so far as may be, your presence among us. Your portrait placed in our hall of meeting, if you will permit it to be taken, will there constantly remind us of one, the freest that we have ever known from every sordid aim ; the readiest that we have ever known to spend himself in all self-denying labours for others ; the most forgetful of himself, and who therefore may least of all be forgotten of us. Nor will this be our only gain ; we shall thus, as we would fain hope, be also reminded that only as we carry on our work in the spirit which you would have imparted, which we trust you have bequeathed to us, only while we regard it first and chiefly as a labour of faith and love, can we look for any true success, any lasting blessing upon it.—Signed on behalf of the committee,

‘ RICHARD C. TRENCH, Chairman.’

Mr. Maurice's Letter to the Pupils of Queen's College on their presenting him with a Silver Inkstand.

‘ 21 Queen Square, December 15, 1853.

‘ MY DEAR FRIENDS,

‘ The beautiful inkstand which you have given me, in recollection of the many happy hours I have passed in Queen's College, will be always very precious to me. I only hope that I may have been able to teach any of you as much, or half as much, as you have taught me. The blessing of this mutual instruction is one that I looked for even more in a college of ladies than in any other ; and I can truly say that, so far from being disappointed, I have felt it in a way I had not dreamed of. It is, I am sure, the experience of my dear and excellent friends who are still working in the college, of whose affection to the pupils I can testify, and who, I know, will receive their affection as richly as I have done, for they deserve it better. I believe that we are all acting as the feeble and erring witnesses of a Higher Teacher, who is always with you, of whose guidance no circumstances can deprive you. To make you, each and all, aware that you have such a friend, and that He deserves an infinite confidence and love, has, I think, been the object of us all. To effect it would be a higher reward than to obtain any sympathy for ourselves; though I can answer for one, how great a cordial that sympathy is.

‘And so, dear friends, good-bye—a simpler and better phrase of parting than farewell, because it means God be with you.

‘Very sincerely and affectionately yours.’

To Rev. D. J. Vaughan,

‘December 2, 1853.

‘. . . You are quite right in your interpretation of my words. I never dreamed of merging time in eternity. The phrases which suggest such a thought belong to the popular theology and seem to me most unsatisfactory.

‘I maintain that time and eternity co-exist here. The difficulty is to recognise the eternal state under our temporal conditions; not to lose eternity in time. This difficulty which we all feel and confess, and to which preachers so continually allude, has been illustrated I think in my recent controversy with Dr. Jelf. I cannot perceive that he has ever, even for a moment, contemplated eternity as anything but the future state contrasted with the present. This mighty denial, I suppose, death will put an end to. We must some day know that we are living and moving and having our being in God; we cannot always act upon the strange lie that the things which we see are those that determine what we are. But though I may speak of death as bringing us acquainted with eternity, face to face with it, I have no business, as far as I see at present, to speak of death as ending time. I do not exactly understand what that means.

The eternal state I apprehend is the state of a spiritual being, out of time, living in spiritual relations, enjoying or suffering a spiritual inheritance. Its actual conditions will be determined by these, so at least I gather from Scripture, not the inward by the outward, as they seem to be (though they are not really) here.

‘Do I express myself intelligibly? Pray tell me if I do not; for there is nothing I desire more than to be understood by others, except to understand myself, and to be understood by my Creator and Judge.’

The difficulties which had been met with in setting up Associations had brought home to the promoters the need for raising the standard of education among the working-men of London. Throughout the year 1853 a series of lectures had been given and classes had been taught at the “Hall of Association,” in Castle Street, under the superintendence of “a Committee of Teaching and Publication.” The Association movement from various causes was no longer pursued with the same vigour and unity of action by the promoters as it had been at first. Several of the London Associations had been robbed by their treasurers and ruined. To a great extent the centre of gravity of the movement had been shifted from the promoters, as the advisers of the men and the apostles of a principle, to Mr. Neale and the “Central Agency” as providers of the needed capital. Mr. Neale remained one of the Council of Promoters, but his chief influence was altogether independent of them and due to his readiness to lend to any Association that wanted money. My father’s great motive throughout the movement had been always the wish for national unity, the desire to bring together classes that had been alienated from one another. Now as always he was acted on by the dread lest a SECT of Christian Socialists should arise which should become separated from other men by the very effort to proclaim, as its distinctive creed, the fellowship of all men under the Head of Man.

The name “college” attracted him greatly. It seemed to him to imply an association of men as men—an association not formed for some commercial purpose and not limited by coincidence of opinion, and to represent, therefore, that union which he was always striving to bring about. The very difficulties which the associations had met with in London as well as the success which had attended some associations in the provinces, suggested the need in London of bringing men into more intimate relations with one another, if the evils which had in the first instance provoked the setting up of associations were to be successfully met.

All these different influences were pressing on him just at the time when his connection with King's College was, as during many months of 1853 he well knew, coming to an end. It is not very clear at what date the name "Working Men's College" was first presented to his mind. On December 27, 1853, a large body of working-men met at the Hall of Association to present him with a testimonial, and in one of the speeches then made, a hope was expressed that he might not find it a fall to cease to be a professor at King's College and to become the "Principal of a Working Man's College."

The address from the working-men of London was as follows:—

‘DEAR AND RESPECTED SIR,

‘The undersigned members of the working class of this metropolis desire to express to you those feelings of admiration and regard with which your conduct has inspired them.

‘To the greater number you are known chiefly from the service, you have rendered to the class to which they belong by your efforts to improve their condition and introduce a higher and purer tone into their daily life, and from the sacrifices you have made for the maintenance of what you conceive to be vital and essential truths. Those only among them who have enjoyed the pleasure and the privilege of personal communication with you, can fully understand the extent to which those services have been enhanced by the urbanity of manner and kindliness of heart which your intercourse with them has uniformly exhibited.

‘It is with pain and bitter regret that they have become acquainted with recent events connected with your position as a public teacher in one of the chief educational establishments of this country ; and while they desire to avoid any expression of opinion as to the theological aspects of the dispute which has unfortunately arisen, they are convinced that that establishment will be less favourably regarded in consequence of its results ; and the authorities in connection with it having looked upon you as unfit to rank among its most honoured teachers, working-men will come to the conclusion that those authorities are not entitled to their respect. ‘

‘As working-men living among working-men, knowing their views and feelings, they assert with confidence that the affectionate regard for you which they have attempted to express, may be accepted as a faithful reflex of the feeling entertained by many thousands of their fellows ; and they believe that if anything tends to bring the many into real communion with the Church, it is that it numbers among its members men like yourself.

‘That you may long continue to pursue your useful and honourable career ; that the eminent services you have confessedly rendered to the Church and to the cause of education, may meet with a more generous and grateful appreciation ; that those who at present misunderstand and misrepresent you may learn by your example and that they may at least emulate you in the wisdom and zeal with which you have advocated the cause of the working-man, is the sincere and earnest desire of those whose names are hereunto appended.

‘THE COMMITTEE.

‘MR. CHARLES ALLEN, Pianoforte-maker.

MR. WILLIAM ALLAN, Engineer.

MR. CHARLES BOWEN, Tailor.

MR. WILLIAM BURGESS, Lithographer.

MR. WALTER COOPER, Tailor.

MR. ROBERT CURTIS, Pianoforte-maker.

MR. DANIEL HARRIS, Composer.

MR. FREDERICK KENT, Shoemaker.

MR. HENRY JEFFRIES, Shoemaker.

MR. WILLIAM NEWTON, Engineer.

MR. JOSEPH PICKARD, Carpenter.

MR. THOMAS SHORTER, Watch-case Joint finisher.

MR. WILLIAM LIVESY, Smith.

MR. W. TURLEY, Tailor.'

Then follow in addition to the committee 953 names of working-men of every variety of employment, ninety-five different occupations being represented.

To the Reverend F. D. Maurice, M.A., Chaplain of Lincoln's Inn.

' REVEREND SIR,

' Lincoln's Inn, December, 1853.

' We, the undersigned Members of the Honourable Society of Lincoln's Inn, and members of the congregation of Lincoln's Inn Chapel, beg leave to express to you our sentiments of deep sympathy under the circumstances connected with your dismissal from the Professorships of Divinity, and of English Literature and Modern History, at King's College, London.

' It would be out of place for us, we consider, to enter into the theological questions at issue between you and the Reverend Principal of King's College, even though we might cover our presumption by the example of the very mixed body of laity and clergy composing the Council of that college, by which sentence has virtually been pronounced in the matter. But we cannot forbear observing that the materials for a charge against you had to be sought for in your clerical ministrations amongst ourselves, and in the contents of a volume of essays, delivered originally as sermons in Lincoln's Inn Chapel; thus showing demonstrably that no such materials were to be found in your teachings as professor at the college, which has lost the benefit of your services.

' Still less would it become us to animadvert on the forms of proceeding adopted in this matter. But it has been impossible for us to notice without surprise, amongst other things, that in a matter of such moment to the accused and to others, a single discussion should have been held sufficient by men, all of whom could scarcely be familiar with the subject in debate, for the disposal of the many abstruse points of theology involved in the controversy; and that a priest of the English Church, a Professor of Divinity, a theologian of acknowledged eminence, after a decision (which appeared to him to declare "that he had departed from the Orthodox Faith") that the opinions expressed and doubts indicated in his Essays and correspondence respecting future punishments and the final issues of the Day of Judgment were of a dangerous tendency, and likely to unsettle the minds of the theological students—should, upon asking his judges to declare what Article of our faith condemned his teaching, have been met by the reply, that the Council did not consider it necessary to enter further into the subject.

‘For ourselves, Reverend Sir, who are united to you by the ties of your religious ministrations, we feel bound to testify to you on this occasion our gratitude for the spiritual benefits which, by God’s grace, you have conferred upon us, by awakening in us a new sense of the living truth of Holy Scripture, and of the Book of Common Prayer, especially in their application to the events and dealings of our social and common life—whilst many of us have further to express their sense of that uniform courtesy and kindness of manner, that manly frankness and simplicity of character, which have endeared you as a Christian gentleman, and Christianity itself by your example, to all who have the privilege of knowing you.

‘Sincerely trusting that this may be but a passing cloud in your useful and honoured life, and that (whilst continuing to exercise your ministry amongst us) you may soon be restored to some sphere of activity elsewhere, equivalent at least to the one from which you have lately been removed.

‘We are, etc.’

Mr. Maurice's Reply.

‘4 Grand Parade, St. Leonards, ‘December 30, 1853.

‘DEAR FRIENDS,

‘I received a cordial letter, signed by your names, two days before I left London. I did not like to answer hastily a document which was so gratifying to me, and which touched upon questions that are so interesting to us all. I thought I should show my sense of your kindness better if I entered into some explanation of the principles upon which I have endeavoured to act, as the Chaplain of Lincoln’s Inn, and in whatever other sphere I have been permitted to work.

‘You speak of some who have charged me with departing from the “Orthodox Faith.” So long as I continue a minister of the Church of England, such an imputation affects not only my theology, but my moral character; it is a direct impeachment of my honesty. Had it been supported by any evidence that I have denied one of the Articles of Faith to which I have subscribed, I should have been bound to treat it with the greatest seriousness, and to demand an examination of its truth before some competent tribunal. But I am bound to pass by with indifference the mere dicta of individuals, however respectable, on such a subject. The Church of England has not made us subject to their judgments. By giving us fixed standards of doctrine, she has done what in her lies to protect us against them.

‘The other charge, that my teaching is dangerous, and likely to unsettle the minds of those who are brought under my influence, especially of young men, is of a different character. It evades the test of formularies; it must be confirmed or refuted by experience. I can quite understand how much justification good and intelligent men may see for it, in the course which I have followed in my teaching ever since I have taught at all. I merely protest against the assertion, that I have, in any, even the slightest, degree, departed from that course recently, or have spoken or written any words which make me more liable to the imputation than I was seven years ago.

- ‘I have the best reason to know that the minds of numbers in all classes of society—of young men especially—are unsettled, not on some trifling or secondary questions, but on those which affect their inmost faith and their practical conduct, on those which concern the character of God and their relations to Him. I know that it is counted wisdom by many, not to recognise these difficulties at all, or, if they cannot help acknowledging them, to treat them as sinful doubts which must be suppressed, because they interfere with the authority of the Scriptures and of the Church. The ecclesiastical position of those who hold this opinion and act upon it, entitles them to my respect. I should have followed their maxim implicitly, if I had not been thoroughly convinced, that by doing so, I should foster the infidelity which they desire to check—causing it to break out openly in the more honest, because they feel that that cannot be true which shrinks from the light—tempting the cowardly and self-indulgent to a feigned acquiescence, which involves, it seems to me, the most real and deadly Atheism.
- ‘I have maintained, therefore, long before I ministered among you—and in every sermon which I have preached to you—that there is no safety but in looking fairly in the face all the difficulties which beset ourselves; but in frankly meeting all the difficulties which torment our brethren; that God encourages us to do this; that by doing it we show that we trust Him to give us the help which He has promised us, a help which can deliver us from falsehood and guide us into all truth.
- ‘So far as I have been enabled steadily to pursue this method with myself, with you, with all who have in any way been brought under my teaching; so far I have found that the Scriptures and the forms of the Church have unfolded their meaning to me, have shown me a way out of my perplexities, and out of the perplexities of the age; have offered me a deeper theology and a wider humanity than I had ever imagined for myself, or than the age, with its splendid professions,—I will not say has ever realised,—but has ever dreamed of. So far as I have faltered in this course, and I have often done so, the Bible has become to me a sealed book, the Prayers of the Church have become dull formalities, not the worship of spiritual beings to Him who is a Spirit.

‘I have, you know, been more anxious that you should learn from the Bible and from the Church than from me. I have endeavoured to set them forth as instruments by which God would raise you above your conceits and mine. But I have been as earnest that you should not worship the instruments instead of Him who uses them; that you should receive God’s Word as the witness of His love, and what it has effected for us and for mankind, God’s Church as the living and continuous witness that that Love is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, and that it will put down evil and establish righteousness throughout the universe.

‘I do not repent of any words in which I have spoken to you of this Love as mightier than all which is opposed to it, or of the triumphs which it is yet to achieve. I believe that, if I had spoken more broadly, strongly, freely on this subject, I should have done more to make you righteous and true. My fear is not of expanding, but of contracting, the Gospel which we are sent to preach; not of seeing too strong a testimony in the Bible to the will of Him in whom is light and no darkness at all, but of limiting its testimonies to meet my narrow conceptions; not of exaggerating the duty of the Church to be a witness against all hard and cruel conceptions of our Father in Heaven, which lead to a confusion between Him and the Spirit of Evil, but of not perceiving how manifold are the ways in which that duty should be fulfilled. I am sure that if the Gospel is not regarded as a message to all mankind of the redemption which God has effected in His Son; if the Bible is thought to be speaking only of a world to come, and not of a Kingdom of Righteousness and Peace and Truth with which we may be in conformity or in enmity now; if the Church is not felt to be the hallower of all professions and occupations, the bond of all classes, the instrument of reforming abuses, the admonisher of the rich, the friend of the poor, the asserter of the glory of that humanity which Christ bears, — We are to blame, and God will call us to account as unfaithful stewards of His treasures.

‘I am sure, dear friends, that you will desire for me and for those with whom I work—(more kind and cordial fellow-labourers no one ever had)—at Lincoln’s Inn, that we may be more truly the ministers of our fellow-men, by being more faithfully the ministers of God. I can answer for them and for myself, that we desire for the Society which has appointed us, and for all who hear us regularly or occasionally, all the blessings which Christmas speaks of, and a New Year of greater zeal, unity, and therefore in the best sense, happiness, than any which has been given to them hitherto.’

To Mr. R. H. Hutton.

‘MY DEAR SIR,

‘Hurstmonceux, January 8, 1854.

‘If I found any fault with your paper in the Inquirer it would be this; that you have represented me as resting my case on my own personal experience in King’s College, and on the advantage which subscription to Articles gave me in my quarrel with Dr. Jelf. I do not think if you read the preface again you will find that my vanity was quite so egregious, or my conclusions, however false, based on quite such a pin-point as this. I had spoken of a conviction formed years ago—deliberately formed—opposing the bias of my education—that Articles are not unfriendly to progress, but are favourable to it; that we are likely to revolve in endless circles, not to advance at all, if we assume that nothing has been done or proved yet in the world concerning moral and spiritual principles. As I had put forward these assertions with some earnestness, and had repeated them often, I was anxious to show why I had not been led to recant them by that which had befallen me. That was my excuse for alluding to the subject. I think still that it was a valid excuse. Whether I liked Articles in my own particular case, because they helped Dr. Jelf and me to cheat each other in the dark, or—as I affirmed—because they saved us from that necessity, is not the principal question. I merely referred to the particular case at all to show how it bore upon an opinion which I had adopted and professed years before I ever heard Dr. Jelf's name or was the least likely to be a teacher in any college with Articles or without them.

‘Perhaps I cannot better introduce what I should wish to say about your remarks on Christ and the Holy Spirit in the Inquirer, than by correcting a mistake—a serious one—into which you have fallen respecting my view of the Scriptures. I never supposed that they were to be to the moral student what the outward world is to the physical. I always maintained and have tried to act out the conviction that the whole field of human experience and history lies open to us and requires to be searched and dug into. I have not affirmed a priori that the Bible did not merely exhibit one set of phenomena and explanations of phenomena a few of which were to be accepted, the majority rejected like the stories and explanations of stories in the religious books of the Hindoos. But I have said a posteriori that I believed the Bible did serve as a key book which enabled us to understand the histories and legends of various nations, to justify the true beliefs which were in them, to show what false beliefs or unbeliefs had mingled with these, to explain how they had become confounded. I have called for the application of this most severe test to its records; I have said that they ought to bear it if the book is what it assumes to be, and that Christians have wronged and degraded it by severing it from all other books instead of manfully evincing their own confidence in its veracity and its strength by trying whether it will not throw light upon all.

‘You seem to treat the question whether there may not be just as well twenty, or thirty, or a hundred, or thirty thousand mediators between God and man as merely a question between you and me turning upon philosophical experience.

‘Now I—holding as you do that the whole experience of the world is intended for the moralist and theologian, not a particular portion of it which has been gone through in Judea or England in the first century or the nineteenth—find all religions of the world so many attempts to produce these twenty or thirty or a hundred or thirty thousand mediators. I find them bearing the most harmonious unanimous testimony to the necessity of some uniting point between the absolute Godhead and the voluntary worshipping creature. I find them broken, divided, superstitious schemes for propitiating an unwilling and ungracious Being, because they have not been able to perceive the uniting point, because they have been obliged to create it, somewhere in the material or the spiritual world. And I accept the Bible explanation of this difficulty—the Bible proclamation of the One Person in whom God is at one with His creatures, in whom He can meet them and they can meet Him—as perfectly satisfying to my own individual conscience, and also to that reason of mankind which I trace in all these diverse and warring experiences.

‘I have attempted to explain in my Boyle Lectures* why I think the experiences of mankind respecting a Divine Spirit who awakens the thoughts, faculties, faith, hope, love in us, and directs them to an object above themselves, to a common object, in whom they find that which satisfies them, and which they are created to behold and enjoy, are altogether distinct from those respecting a Mediator—why, when they are separated from them or substituted for them, the result is either a priestcraft such as we see in Hindooism, or a self-worship such as we see in Buddhism, the two never being able to coalesce, each continually becoming more degraded, more superstitious, more exclusive. I will not go over the evidence here. I merely refer to it that you may see I have not been so heedless of the difficulty you have started as you suppose. I do not attach any extravagant value to any arguments of mine or to any course of thought through which I have been led. Valeat quantum valebit. As it has been useful to me, I have no right to conceal it; on many it may fall quite dead. I do hope and trust that I should be glad to see every notion of mine exposed and annihilated if it blocks up the way to truth. To exhibit that truth, not in notions but in a Person, has been and is the object of my life. I believe that so it will unite us all to each other, that while we behold it split into opinions, it must separate us more and more from each other. But I rejoice to think that you believe in a Spirit of Truth who can guide us into all truth. If you cherish that faith and act upon it, I am sure it will signify very little to you whether or not you regard me as a truth-seeker and truth-lover. I believe it is the idlest of all tasks to assert or to argue for one's own sincerity. It is not good for much if it wants to be defended; nor can any man accept our defence of ourselves except so far as we help to make them more sincere. So far as God enables me to do that for any one, I shall lead one more person to glorify Him; one's own name may be left in His hands to justify it or extinguish it as seems to Him best.'

* ‘The Religions of the World and their Relations to Christianity.’

In a correspondence with Mr. Kingsley and Mr. D. Macmillan, he had again recurred to his favourite scheme of a set of 'Cambridge Tracts.' The first was to be one on the Oxford movement. He had sent Mr. Kingsley a sketch of it in a letter dated January 6, 1854. To this sketch he refers in the following letter as "my Oxford tract."

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'January 10, 1854.

'All your hints are most valuable and have determined my thoughts. The one on Ash Wednesday is invaluable. Whether it is adopted or not in fact, it expresses that which should be the character of the whole course, viz. confessional for the clergy first, not first for those to whom they preach. Macmillan demurs to my title. He says they will say at Cambridge, "What right have you to assume that you represent us?" He maintains that the objection will be a most valid one, because the actual faith of Cambridge is as low as possible. I do not assent altogether to his arguments; but they are worth something, and on the whole I believe 'Tracts for Priests and People' will do better. I should propose to begin with a tract affirming that there is a separation, as all admit, between priests and people, that it is increasing and that it must increase till the priests look for the causes of it in themselves and in their unbelief, till they know what Gospel they have to preach, and preach it. Then I would enter into the causes which hinder each class of Churchmen from fulfilling its own professions, and into the demands of the people. This I think is more to the purpose than my Oxford tract, from which however there is a hint that may be afterwards developed.

*

*

*

*

*

'What I should like is to get up a meeting of young London clergy to consider that special question, "How is the chasm between Priests and People to be filled up?" From that might come my college as a practical carrying out of the idea of the tracts. The proposal has been kindly received in many quarters, but it requires careful consideration and the exclusion of all big-wigs.'

A little earlier the "Promoters" had heard of a "People's College," which had been established at Sheffield, in 1842, by an Independent minister, Mr. Bayley. On the day following that of the above letter, i.e. on January 11, 1854, at one of the Promoters' meetings at Queen Square, Mr. V. Neale read a letter from the Secretary of the People's College at Sheffield, giving an account of its origin and history. In its later form this "college" had been due to a spontaneous movement on the part of the Sheffield working-men in 1848. After the Secretary's letter had been read to the "Promoters," a motion was made by Mr. Hughes, and seconded by Mr. Lloyd Jones, that "It be referred to the Committee of Teaching and Publication to frame, and so far as they think fit to carry out, a plan for the establishment of a People's College in connection with the Metropolitan Associations." After several meetings of this committee, my father undertook to prepare a scheme for the college.

By February 7, 1854, he had drawn up, and had printed a scheme set forth in twelve pages, which, after some modifications and much debate, became the basis of the organisation of the Working Men's College. A circular was also drawn up by him to give an account of the proposal and its purposes.

One of the Associations which had failed, had formerly occupied a house, No. 31, Red Lion Square. As my father had made himself responsible for the rent of this house, it was immediately available for the purposes of the college. Subscriptions were obtained from a few friends, and it was agreed that he should give a set of lectures, both to obtain funds and to make the subject better known. Though for the moment the nucleus of the teachers would naturally consist of his old friends, he believed that it would be always possible to recruit the teaching portion of the college from the number of men who yearly come up to London from the older Universities, who have sufficient leisure and knowledge, and who would gain in teaching as much as their pupils in learning. He had great hopes that in this way, if the movement extended to the University towns and the great commercial centres, a connecting bond between the Universities and the mass of the people might be found; that the "Church" would show that it could "educate the nation;" that sectarian difficulties would be overcome; that another motive than the money one would be furnished for national education, viz. the effort of each portion of the nation to turn to account the powers it possessed to supply what others lacked, to the common good of all.

The meetings of the "Executive Committee" of the Promoters were still continued, and were still occupied with Co-operative business, but his name appears less often than hitherto in the list of those present at them, and the larger meetings of the Promoters were almost wholly occupied with the college scheme.

Meantime the 'Theological Essays' were provoking discussion in all parts of the country, and letters were continually reaching him from those who wished to clear up points that had been raised in these discussions. It would be impossible within the compass of such a work as this to give more than an occasional specimen of his answers.

To Rev. D. J. Vaughan.

‘January 18, 1854.

‘I hope I said nothing in the Essay on Atonement which could hinder any one from drawing the divinest life and comfort from the words, “The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin;” they are to me some of the most wonderful and practically necessary in the Bible. The force of them and of the whole doctrine of sacrifice seems to me hidden from multitudes by the heathenish mode in which we invert the Gospel of God’s reconciliation, losing I think quite as much the true sense of God’s wrath as of His mercy.

‘I have felt so indignant at the perversions of this truth, which are turning, as I almost know, thousands into infidels and hundreds into Romanists, that I fear I may not be always meek and gentle with the butchers of God’s words and Church. But I have never intended to say a harsh syllable against the Evangelicals as such, whom I honour and reverence for what they have done, and whom I would never complain of for denying other men’s convictions, if they would maintain those which they have inherited from their fathers. When I see them defacing and distorting them, and yet trying to live upon the reputation of the truths which they do not hold, I cannot be silent, especially now that they are the most influential of all parties, and have the greatest power of bestowing patronage or inflicting injury. I have no personal complaint against even the most outrageous of the school. On the contrary, I owe a great debt of gratitude to the Record for driving me out of subjection to a school towards which such kindly people as Mr. Bickersteth and others might have held me bound, and for doing the like service to many whose freedom may be of more worth to the world. In my new edition, I have struck out several passages, especially one about dowagers in the Essay on the Atonement, which had distressed some of my friends, and which there could be no motive for retaining, as I cannot now be suspected of wishing to conciliate any respectable people.'

One of the most curious misunderstandings of the whole purport and purpose of his writings, is suggested by the phrase in the last letter, "turning, as I almost know, THOUSANDS into infidels." The manner in which in the 'Theological Essays' and in all his other writings he deals with doubts and difficulties, is pretty clearly explained in his answer, given on p. 225, to the members of Lincoln's Inn. He endeavours, in all his writings, to the utmost of his ability, to set the doubts forth in their fullest manner, before he attempts to answer them. He tries, that is to say, to do the utmost justice to those from whom he differs. He acknowledges their difficulties as his own. He does not attack the doubters; but endeavours to help them to overcome their doubts. He makes it evident that he does not consider himself an advocate bound to maintain, at all cost, a position once taken up, irrespective of fact and evidence, but that he looks upon it as his bounden duty to acknowledge all truth that is presented to him, from whatever quarter it comes. Furthermore, he does this not only, not so much, as part of the duty of every upright Englishman, though he acknowledges that obligation: but because he is a clergyman, and as such bound to acknowledge the essentially "personal" and divine nature of truth and fact. He believed that Truth makes his own choice of the agents by which he will be made known, and may suddenly come to his temple, through the mouth of a working-man or a young girl, so that though the agents themselves may not know the true force of their words, the words themselves may yet give light to those that are seeking it. His patience therefore and his reverence for all men were essentially a part of his worship of the Christ in all men.

There can, I think, be no question that this manner of his led, to an extent of which he was himself wholly unaware, to the notion being quite honestly held by some who read his books, that he was stating his own belief, or at least the most vigorous part of it, when he was frankly stating the case of the objector.

One secret undoubtedly of his accurate knowledge of what men were thinking, and half afraid to express, lay in those "Bible-classes," Mr. Mansfield's description of which has been given on p. 488, Vol. I.

But though a body of mixed laymen, the nucleus of which was a knot of Lincoln's Inn barristers, thus furnished my father with materials for a diagnosis of the troubled minds of his time such as scarcely any other man had, there were also many other sources from which knowledge of what men were thinking continually reached him.

He had Bible-classes also of working-men, containing some of those who had been the leading spirits in 1848, and others who became some of the best, most active, and most self-sacrificing members of the Working Men's College. Of the class so formed, just before the college was opened, he has said: "The course which I pursued was simply this: I read a portion of the Scriptures, I explained what I thought was the meaning of it, then I invited all possible questioning from those about me. I wished them to ask anything that came into their minds, anything that was pressing upon their minds. They met my wish, and I have never had one cause to complain of want of reverence, nor yet of failure of boldness and freedom to state frankly what they were thinking and feeling. And in this way, I affirm that I have learned more than I have imparted. Again and again, the wish has come into my mind, when I have left those classes, 'Would to God that anything I have said to them may have been as useful to them as what they have said to me has been to me!'"

He had Bible-classes of ladies, and later in life he had some Bible-classes, which specially interested him, of London tradesmen.

It was his habitual practice Sunday after Sunday to bring out the thoughts which had been suggested by the actual difficulties that had been presented to him during the week, and to endeavour to clear them away. This he had done more fully and more completely in the 'Theological Essays' than elsewhere.

Now considering for a moment the way in which such a treatment of difficulties must strike a man bred up in the Scotch "Free Church," where difficulties were then at least never met but always silenced by a vote of public opinion, it is not very surprising that their leading minister taking up the 'Theological Essays,' should suppose that the difficulties were introduced in order to make much of them, not in order to acknowledge and sift the truth that was in them and to confirm the faith of those who felt them.

To Mr. D. Macmillan.

'February 23, 1854.

'Have you heard that Dr. Candlish came up from Scotland to lecture against me at Exeter Hall, and cut up the Essays in presence of a vast assembly (Miss Stanley says four or five thousand people; but I think that can hardly be) on Tuesday night? He was much applauded; I suppose not one in a hundred of the audience had heard of the book, and not one in fifty of the author, till this Champion of the Free Church proclaimed my crimes. He is certainly not a judicious man, though I cannot but be thankful that attention should be called to the subjects I have treated of, even amidst clappings and "hears." Hort wishes me to answer Mr. Mansel's letter. I would gladly, if I had time, write a letter to him which might be published, "On the Oxford Logic and its Relation to Theology." But I have these lectures* and the best part of my 'Moral Philosophy' on hand; and I am busy concocting the plan of the People's College, and settling how the departments of it are to be arranged and it is to be brought before the public. So I have enough to do at present, and perhaps I shall have to answer Candlish.'

* He was engaged at the time in preparing for press his 'Lectures on Ecclesiastical History.' Nominally he was doing it from some notes taken by his class; practically he rewrote them entirely. His answer to Dr. Candlish appeared as "The Doctrine of Sacrifice deduced from the Scriptures, with a Dedictory Letter to the Members of the Young Men's Christian Association." "Mr. Mansel's Letter" was the prelude to the longest and most important discussion of my father's life, but it will be convenient to defer for the present any notice of it.

All his undertakings were suddenly interrupted by the final illness of his mother and the more sudden death of his sister Priscilla. He writes from his mother's bed-side—"I think I have learnt some lessons which explain the Bible and the Church to me, and the history of both, more than books can."

Answer to an Address accompanying a Present of the Works of Origen, Athanasius, Chrysostom, Gregory of Nazianzum, Luther, and Calvin.

"From some of the late and present Students of King's College."

'21 Queen Square, Bloomsbury, May 11, 1854.

'MY DEAR FRIENDS,

- 'You have given me the most splendid collection of books in my library, and you have made each volume ten times as valuable as it would be in itself, by inscribing your names in it. I had meant to thank you individually for the present, since I am sure that the kindness which it expresses has been felt by each of you. But when I received your united letter, I thought that I should do better if I claimed my old privilege of addressing you as a class. I can tell you better in that way how delightful it is to me that you should remember me, and that I should remember you, in the relation in which we once stood to each other.
- 'I do not only owe these books of Fathers and Reformers to you; I owe to you, in a great measure, the power of reading them, or at least of reading them with any advantage. By trying to tell you the very little I knew of literature and history, civil and ecclesiastical, I acquired a sense of their meaning and value which I am sure I should never have had if I had merely devoted years to them in my own study. Your faces, and my intercourse with you, translated dead words and facts into life. Whenever I look into these volumes, the names which are written in them will, therefore, be the record of obligations which no words can utter, which no separation can diminish.

‘The truth which you have enabled me to realise is one which I trust you will learn more and more thoroughly every day. Thank God! neither your education nor mine is completed; it is but just beginning. All our lives through we must learn by teaching; we must gain stores by distributing what we have. May God enable you to give abundantly, that you may receive abundantly!’

‘You will find the education of troubles, also, no unmeaning or unnecessary addition to this. May that discipline be spared you, one and all, as far as you are able to spare it. May you have the portion of it which is needful to make you brave and free men, true servants of God and of your country. And may thousands of your fellow-men have as much cause to bless you, and to be grateful to you, as I have.

‘Ever your affectionate Friend.’

His lectures, afterwards published, “On Learning and Working” were delivered at Willis’s Rooms in June and July. They brought in £87 for the College. His wife’s health obliged him to leave London as soon as they were over.

To Rev. C. Kingsley.

‘Norwood, July 19, 1854.

‘I was greatly delighted with the ‘Alexandria’—more than I expected to be. The two first I like best, though I think you have managed the Later Philosophy exceedingly well, and Mahomet excellently. There must be more said about him still. The middle ages turn more upon him, and were more saved from perdition through him than I had at all imagined till I came to think more of them. There would have been no belief in Christ if there had not been that broad fierce assertion of an absolute God—let Newman say what he likes, and it is his business, considering the line he has taken, to say a good deal. What he calls the Anti-Christ was the divine means of saving the Catholic Church from Atheism. And oh! how fast is she rushing into it—not Rome only, but Germany and England into it—now. I do hope something from the war in spite of all the feebleness with which it is prosecuted and with which we feel about it; but chiefly as a sign of what God is doing. It is more like the commencement of a battle between God in His absoluteness and the Czar in his than 1848 was, though that might take a more agreeable and popular form. I begin to understand a little better why our sympathies with Greece and even Italy were so violently stifled and generalised. Something better is to come for both than the pirates and brigands could get for them. The National Sermons are a very blessed and opportune help to this result. The reading of them—I have not read all yet—has been a great joy to me and has taught me much that I did not know before, as well as revived much that I was forgetting. I am very glad of the Elizabethan novel, but you must not give over the preaching and writing of sermons, to which you are called by God, and by which you will do the greatest good to mankind. I feel miserably the want of a burning fire to consume my stubble and to make me hotter for Truth and Good than the Devil can make me, or any one in his hell, where, so far as my experience goes—and I know that place—it is generally very cold.*

To Mr. Daniel Macmillan.

‘July 27, 1854.

‘. . . What I have written I have written—and like Pilate’s writing, I am afraid of altering it lest I should substitute to please the Jews, “He said I am king,” for “He is king.” In plain words, my books, such as they are, must stand. If the public does not like to buy them, it may be wise; but I cannot alter or remodel them any further.’

* In his own way Dante says so too. It is in the deepest part of the Inferno, xxxii.:

“I thereon turned and saw before me spread,
And at my feet, a lake exceeding cold,
Which seemed with glass not water to be fed.”

Unpublished translation by the Dean of Wells.

'3 Albion Terrace, Redcar, Yorkshire, August 15, 1854.

'MY DEAR MACMILLAN,

' . . . Perhaps if all goes well and I am alive, I shall be able to see you as I go southwards. I write these words with some solemnity, not merely because in this cholera season one feels as if one's turn might be next, but because the sermons on sacrifice which I have just completed, and still more the dedicatory letter which I have just written to the Young Men's Christian Instruction Society, have seemed to me sometimes like a last speech. However, I have no reason to say so, for anything that I am aware of, and such thoughts come and go, doubtless for some purpose, without having any outward result.'

To Miss Gourlay.

'1854.

' . . I, too, recognise this freemasonry among those who really confess Christ, which Mr. C. speaks of. I think there will be a sense of fellowship among those who renounce themselves, and refer all their life to Christ, which would be wanting among persons who merely profess a faith in Him. I should be afraid to build upon this, to make it the ground of a distinction, lest I should destroy its truth in the very act of doing so.

'The fault of our Evangelical school is, it seems to me, that they have defined the notes of sincerity and fellowship so carefully that they have produced insincerity and separation. I have felt myself warned solemnly by their example never to attempt to distinguish from the human point of view. It is not enough to say: "Oh! of course human judgments are fallible; we cannot be sure who is right and who is wrong." I want certainty. I will have no distinctions which I am forced to annihilate by exceptions and confessions of ignorance as soon as I have made them. Begin from God. Own His distinctions, Who can divide soul and spirit, joints and marrow. Let Him part the sheep in each of us from the goat in each of us, and we obtain that which is most needful for our personal life.

‘And by an outward rite, such as baptism, I obtain the distinction I want between the family and the race to which the family is to be a witness, by that I assert the universality of God’s redemption in Christ, by that I assert also that redemption to be of the sheep in each of us, not of the goat which is given over to everlasting perdition. Baptism tells me that I am God’s child, and may live as if I were; and that I have that within me which will not be subject to the law of God, which will not own Him as a Father, which will not have fellowship with any of my human brethren. This does not confound the evil with the good. It is a perpetual sign to me that God will not confound them, but will put all the width of heaven and hell between them.’

To his Sister, Mrs. Julius Hare.

‘MY DEAREST ESTHER,

‘September, 1854.

‘I am much more desirous to learn than to teach upon the subject of the future state and its occupations. I feel that I have been driven by the necessities of my own being to seek so much more for a present deliverance from cruel and pressing enemies, than for any future bliss, that the vision of the latter has often been almost entirely obscure to me. I am sure that this has been a grievous loss to myself, and has put me at a distance from many with whom I should wish to be in sympathy. But I am sure, also, that there is a deep reason why to particular persons, particular portions of truth should be, for a while, in shadow. They may miss great comfort, but they are thereby shown what they especially are appointed to understand and proclaim. The blindness and ignorance is their own, but the illumination in the other direction is God’s. The necessity of confessing a kingdom of Heaven within—a kingdom of Heaven ever present with us now; different in kind from the visible world, but affecting it, and swaying its movements continually—has been with me an overwhelming one. At times I have seen clearly, and even felt how little it could avail to talk of such a kingdom in a corrupt and evil world, to men oppressed with plagues, and tormented with devils, unless one could give them a much fuller and brighter prospect of that which is to come, than I have ever done. I have perceived that sometime or other I must either hold my tongue, or that it must be unloosed to speak of the better things which shall one day be manifested. But the hindrance has been great, partly from the feeling that the future state, as we are wont to hear it described, is so vague, so selfish, so much a denial of that truth concerning the redeemed state of man, which I have been sent to bear witness of; partly from the dreariness and coldness of my own heart and imagination, and from the hollow in my head where the organ of hope should be. Since we are saved by hope, the consciousness of being without any natural tendency to it, or capacity for it, has been more crushing to me than any one knows. But how deeply does one learn by this very misery, that it is hope which purifies, hope which delivers! How is one obliged to feel the force of the words, The God of Hope! How thoroughly one knows that the Devil is the spirit of despair!

But the result is, that the words of the Apostle, "Looking for the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ," have seemed to me the only words that gave me any glimpse into the future state, or into the use which we are to make of it, in urging ourselves and others to fight. I think the Millenarians are altogether right, and have done an infinite service to the Church, in fixing our minds upon these words, and so turning them away from the expectations of mere personal felicity apart from the establishment of Christ's kingdom; from the notion of Heaven which makes us indifferent to the future condition of the earth. I think they have done good, also, in urging the hope of Christ's coming, as a duty upon the Church, and in denouncing the want of it as a sin. But it seems to me that a preparation was needed for these statements and exhortations, which they have not given us. Their preaching, I fear has been false and mischievous, because they have not begun with acknowledging Christ as the King over men's spirits, as their Redeemer from the evil spirit, as the Ruler over the universe now, and therefore have substituted for the revelation or unveiling of Him, which the Apostles speak of, the notion of an external advent or descent, which instead of carrying out the work which He came upon earth to do—instead of being the fulfilment of His spiritual redemption, instead of affirming that triumph of mankind over all its oppressors which was implied in His cross and resurrection and ascension—reverses the order of His government and redemption, sets the visible again above the invisible, lays the world at the feet of the same selfish tyrants, who under religious pretexts—boasting the name of saints—have trampled it down already and obstructed its intercourse with its just and lawful Ruler. If this is their truth and their error, then it must be our duty and privilege to believe constantly that Christ the Redeemer of Mankind, who has been manifesting Himself in all ages for the deliverance of the earth from its tyrants, and for the assertion of right and truth against wrong and falsehood, will be manifested completely for that end, that every eye shall see Him, that every thing shall be brought to light by Him, that every creature shall be unveiled in its true character and condition by the revelation of Him, who is the firstborn of every creature; that all who have exercised any dominion or influence under Him, and for Him, shall give account of that dominion and influence, and shall confess all that was right in it to have been His; all that was oppressive and blighting and hurtful, to have been from their resistance to His will; all that was feeble and ineffectual in it, to have been from distrust of His power.

‘I think, as I have said already, that the Millenarians are right, and practical, and in harmony with scripture when they bid us think more of Christ's victory over the earth and redemption of it to its true purposes, than of any new condition into which we may be brought when we go out of the earth. By doing so, they make all our feelings and interests social, they connect everything we do and feel and suffer, with our kind ; they give us Christ as the object of our thoughts, and not ourselves. The danger which people have apprehended in listening to them, that they should lose the sense of personal immortality, and should feel the departure out of the present condition of things rather a cause of lamentation than of thanksgiving, is a real danger, if the belief of Christ in us, Christ the present King, is not associated continually with that expectation of good for the earth, and does not give it all its shape and colour. If it does, I conceive we may confidently look forward to death as a step in the revelation of Christ, as the rending asunder of a veil which has obstructed our vision of Him who died and rose again, as a removal of shadows and falsehoods ; as a means of bringing us out of the confusions which have made God's ways unintelligible to us ; as the accomplishment of a long series of discipline and processes which we have understood very little, and repined at very much ; as the explanation of our fellow-men whom we have misjudged and refused to work with ; as the emancipation of powers which have been enfeebled, crushed and turned to ignominious uses ; as the preparation for newer and freer and more effectual services, in which Christ will employ us for the same ends which we ought to aim at here, the manifestation of His character and kingdom, the putting down of His enemies. If we are now the sons of God, we may leave Him to settle what we shall be, in what exercises we shall be engaged, what special tasks shall be assigned us. The comfort is, to think that He will be the orderer of us and our ways, and not any one else ; that we may look forward to do His commandments, hearkening unto the voice of His words ; that it is His will to break all fetters which hinder us from this free service.

‘The great thing, I suspect, is to assure ourselves, not that these things may be, but that they shall be ; that Christ's appearing is as certain as the sun's rising, or as our deaths ; that we do not make it certain by our faith, but that its certainty is the warrant of our faith, and that which is to cure us of its sluggishness. And if this is so, we may encourage all persons always to expect Christ's manifestation; the more they do expect it, the better they will be, the more they will rise out of their sloth, their scorn, their confusions, their selfishness; the more they will work on manfully in their own appointed tasks, whatever they be, the more they will work with each other; the more they will fight against the temptations which will recur in a thousand different shapes, and will come again and again, as angels of light, to separate themselves from others under any pretence whatever, in faith, in hope, in worship; the more they will prize common thanksgivings, common prayers, and will rejoice to meet in using them, that they may pray against the devil, who is leading them, and all the people about them, to set up themselves, that they may not trust Christ, and glorify God; the more they will endure all stupid preaching as one of God's appointed trials of our faith and patience, and as a strong reason for asking Him to send true pastors, or else to stop all our mouths, and speak Himself, which I take it He is doing, and that in very wonderful and terrible thunders, as well as in very soft whispers. And this has much to do with the recognition of friends in a future state. I have always said, with what sorrow and sincerity God is my witness: Have we ever yet recognised our friends in this state? Is it not just the poorest beginning of recognition, the occasional exchange of a smile or signal of freemasonry, followed by hours and days of misconception and estrangement? Is not this the thing of all others to strive for, and therefore to expect? Is not the want of it that which most makes us ashamed, and therefore which we are sure God reproves in us, and desires to correct in us? If in spite of all reluctance, we determine not to go out in search of Christ into the deserts, not to shut ourselves in the secret chambers that we may have Him to ourselves there, if we will expect Him among the knaves and blackguards and hypocrites of the world, and will act as if we believed they had the same right in Him as we have, seeing we are knaves, blackguards and hypocrites without Him, and they will be delivered from their stupidity, knavery and hypocrisy, if they acknowledge Him as the Truth and the Life—we shall be acquiring by degrees the power of recognition, the human sympathies which He is seeking to cultivate in us; we shall be winning a victory over the vanity and conceit which shut us up in our own little circles and lesser selves; we shall be preparing for the gathering together of all in Christ. Which gathering together, cannot, as I think, the least interfere with the development of all the special, individual faculties with which it has pleased God to endow us, but must be the means of educating them to their highest point, and of directing them to their highest purposes. Here the great hindrance to all work is, that it is not fellow-work. The philologist cannot understand for what the chemist spends nights and days in his laboratory; the painter and the musician scarcely know what the other is about; how little does either care for the jurist or the moralist! Each is seeking after some precious stone, some elixir, some uniting law which would explain contradictory facts, or other laws which he cannot doubt, yet which seem at variance. Each pursues long trains of thought, often finds them ending where they began, weeps in secret, and dies disappointed, and the preacher gets up and declares that he has spent his years in vanity. It has not been so! it is not true! There has been vanity in all his work, for there has been selfishness in all. There has been disappointment, for God has been leading him, in a way he knew not, to find that truth is deeper than all his trowings about it. But nothing has been in vain, no threads have been begun to be unwound which shall not be altogether unwound. We want but the discovery of the centre that all men and all thoughts should fall into their proper orbits and accomplish their complete revolutions. The revelation of Christ must be the revelation, however gradually, of all these hidden principles and secret powers, and directing laws, which men in all directions have been seeking after; must be the revelation of all the relations in which they stand to each other and to God's universe. But the majority of the world are not seeking for these, but are engaged in hard physical toils. And shall not the purpose and meaning of all these be revealed also? Shall not the benefits which they have been procuring to those who have been engaged in them, while they have seemed only to be ministering to the luxury and corruption of other men; the victories which they have won over the curse of the earth; the powers which they have awakened and cultivated, be all made manifest before men and angels; the principalities and powers, which have tried to make men's labours the means of crushing and enslaving them, being made a show of openly, and the Son of God vindicating the name of the carpenter's son which He bore upon earth by asserting every energy of man's bodily frame, every natural machine as His?

- ‘To speak of the revelation of all the blessings which have been wrought out in the hearts of men and women through sickness and sufferings; to say how all the powers and energies which disease has cramped, will attain the freedom which Christ's word gave to the palsied man and leper; to say how the whole creation, which has groaned and travailed, shall enter into the liberty of the Son of God, is not for me. The Gospels and the 8th Chapter of the Romans have said it all, and I only throw out this hint to show how much more we are actually told of the effects of the manifestation of Christ in Scripture, than we commonly fancy, how much the history of His Incarnation is the foretaste and prophecy of them.
- ‘So far, then, as I have at present been taught—and I must repeat again how little I feel I have been taught—respecting the future state, I would try (1st) always to connect it with the unveiling or manifestation of Jesus Christ, as St. Paul and St. John do; (2nd) to connect it, as they do, with the restoration of the earth, and its deliverance from whatever hinders it from being the kingdom of God, and of His Christ; (3rd) to connect it with the manifestation of Christ in the flesh as the Lord of Man, as his deliverer from all that degrades him from being the image of God, and the member of a kind, into the slave of the world he is set to rule, and a self-seeker; (4th) to connect it with all our actual and present pursuits, occupations, duties, enjoyments, sufferings, so that the full fruit and result and consummation of these shall be what we look forward to, as the effect of their being restored to their obedience to Christ, and saved from all that is base or merely accidental; (5th) to connect it with continuous, though free and joyful labour, so that no redeemed spirit shall ever be imagined to be the possessor of a certain felicity, and not the warrior with Christ's enemies, so long as there are any to be put down; the ruler and judge of some province of His empire, the seeker and discoverer of the secrets of God's truth and glory, which He has hidden, that His children may search them out.'

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'Matlock, October 19, 1854.

'So long as Thomas Cooper believes in the 7th Chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, and really acknowledges a battle between the flesh and the spirit in himself, it does not signify two straws what he thinks of you and me, how much he mistakes our meaning and imputes to us the meaning which of all that exist we most abhor. He will be obliged to ask God to tell him whether He is or not, and whether He is a destroyer or deliverer, and God will give him the answer. So there we may leave him, wishing earnestly that we ourselves, and all may be brought to the same dire necessity if ever we manufacture a God of soft paste or of iron, instead of trusting one who is, and who lives, to break in pieces our bars of iron, to give solidity to our paste, to lift us out of the hell—the eternal torment which I not only believe, but know that we must be saved from, because I have been in it. What a weary task it is to be explaining and justifying ourselves. God will explain and justify us, if it is necessary, in His good time; let us ask Him first of all to explain and justify Himself. I say this because I have been bothering myself about these explanations of my own intentions (anent Dr. Candlish), and I am sick of the business. However, I believe it was to be done. Will you read over the prospectus * and give me your criticism? I know you will make some complaints, but we have done what we could, and I think there must be a blessing on it.'

All October was occupied with correspondence about the arrangement of classes for the first term at the College. To the no small delight of all, Mr. Ruskin, on a circular being sent to him, volunteered to join and to take a drawing-class.

On October the 30th my father gave the inaugural address at St. Martin's Hall to a full room. By November the 9th the number of students admitted exceeded one hundred and thirty.

He gave a series of lectures in Edinburgh and Glasgow during December, and wrote to his wife warm accounts of the kind reception he had met with everywhere.

To Rev. C. Kingsley.

'January 3, 1855.

'I cannot see my way about the future of the war more than you can, but I think the present of it has brought us more good, with all its misery, than I could have dreamed of. I am sure there is something more like a national heart and godliness amongst us than I have had any experience of in my day. The papers are doing their best to kill the good; the Times seems to me horribly wicked. But God is stronger than they are, and I do not think they have succeeded in making the working people discontented. They cared nothing for them while they were eaten up by the Mammon worshippers, and now they affect sympathy with them when they are beginning to feel that all are working and suffering together. I do not make out that the ministers have blundered more than any other men with their inexperience would have done, and I would not throw a stone at them for the world.

* I.e. of the classes for the first term of the Working Men's College.

‘I do not the least enter into the Kossuth notion about our duty to the “Nationalities;” if there is any good in them, if they are nations, and not nationalities, they will help themselves. Our business, so far as I can gather from history, has never been to make a crusade for them, but to resist whatever power in Spain, France, Russia, set itself up to break down national boundaries and establish a universal empire. It has been no choice with us, whether we would do this or not; we have been forced to do it, when we were most reasonably and remarkably reluctant. God has sent us upon the errand, if we were ever so inclined to escape in a ship of Tarshish and look after our commercial prosperity.

‘I had a very pleasant visit to Edinburgh and Glasgow. Dear Mr. Erskine took rooms in a private hotel with his sister, and entertained me there. Russel was very kind. The lectures went off very well. G——, whom I expected to like, seemed to me a great sham as a preacher; somewhat better, but not satisfactory, as a man.

‘Did you see Sir William Hamilton and James Mackenzie? The former has the grandest head, and the other is the most beautiful old man I ever looked upon. All I met with were in great delight with your article in the North British. Hugh Miller dined with me at Russel’s. He is a simple, modest, true man.

‘I want very much to see the novel. Ruskin is doing capitally in the drawing-class at the College. Our past term was far beyond our hopes, but we must expect a falling off.’

To Miss Williams Wynn.

‘January 8, 1855.

‘I intended to have returned you in person the letter which you so kindly left with me; but I must not keep it longer. It is cordial and earnest as everything which comes from the Bunsens is. I have to thank them for the most unwearying kindness, which I did nothing to deserve, whilst they were in England, and which one misses greatly now they are gone. At the same time I heartily rejoice, for their sakes, at their deliverance from what I am sure must have been an oppressive burthen, and their restoration to a free and genial life in a society with which they can sympathise. England, I have no doubt, will look a brighter spot to them in the distance than it did when they saw closely all its terrible corruptions and abominations. And after all, that view which we get, when these blots are not the most prominent objects in a nation or an individual, is the truest. God does not look upon iniquity; that is, I suppose, He sees the man and the nation according to their true idea, and not as they make themselves by forgetting and departing from it. What that idea is, I think, a native who feels and suffers with his land, who is conscious of its sins as his own, who is in any manner called to struggle with them and bear witness against them, must know better than any foreigner can. I feel it is the greatest mistake in an Englishman to dream that he can determine the method of thought or of action which a German student or reformer should follow. I do not speak merely of one who is so ignorant of German life and literature as I am. If I had the profoundest acquaintance with it which could be acquired by years of study of books, intercourse with natives, residence in the country, I think I should be more, not less, convinced that the work of correcting and elevating the tone of the nation must devolve upon its own citizens, and that much inferior and less accomplished men and women among them could do what the most wise stranger would attempt in vain. I read this autumn Niebuhr's comments upon England. They did me good for they made me smart. I acknowledged with the deepest personal consciousness all that he said of our coldness and reserve. But when he boasted that he understood us better than we understood ourselves, and could read us lectures, not on faults of our Government or of our character, but on the way of reforming them, on the course which it behoved us to adopt, my conscience rebelled. I listened to his reproofs as if God were speaking to me through him; I felt as certainly that God was forbidding me to shape and mould myself according to his maxims.

‘For precisely the same reasons, no deference that I feel for Bunsen’s character and knowledge, no conviction deeper than he or you would give me credit for, of my own deficiencies, no bitter and intense experience of the truth of much which he says about our dulness and blindness, could justify me to my conscience or to God, if I submitted to his decisions respecting the method which an English theologian, in our day, ought to follow. I could have saved myself from much sorrow, and have obtained much sympathy that I have longed for, if I could have attached myself to the anti-English school of thought, when I had found the impossibility of fraternising with any of the special English schools. But a higher voice said in me, “That is not the way, walk not in it! Never mind being called Jesuitical, bigoted, half-hearted, eclectic, any name that you hate most, never mind who bestows it upon you, that does not signify a jot. You are not sent into the world to get credit for freedom of mind, liberality, manliness, sincerity, but, so far as you are shown how, to bear witness of that which you know, to testify that which you have seen.”

‘Bunsen’s book on the Church of the future taught me clearly what I had suspected before, that every earnest German must begin with the Spirit, that he may come to learn something of the Father and the Son. I am as certain as I can be of anything, that our process is the opposite one, that we must begin from the Father, in order that we may know something of the Son and the Spirit; and that our greatest national errors, shortcomings and sins, have arisen from our forsaking that line, which God has marked out for us.

‘If you found anything in my book on Sacrifice which met the wants of your spirit, it is because I was led to refer the ground of sacrifice to God and not to man, to trace the meaning and origin of sacrifice to the will of the Father. There is nothing in this view of the subject which Bunsen will sympathise with. He contemplates sacrifice either as originating with the sense of sin or of thanksgiving, hence the idea of the completed Christian sacrifice is with him in direct contrast with the idea of the incomplete Levitical sacrifice.

‘You may therefore be quite sure, though I have said nothing or next to nothing about the Christian priesthood, that the whole book (if he should read it, which is very improbable) will be Levitical and abracadabra to him. He will not be able to reduce my doctrine under either of his formulas; therefore he will simply put it aside as unmeaning. And he will be quite right to do so, for it will not meet any of the habits of his mind, and what business have I to unsettle them? All I want is liberty to speak the word that is put into my mouth to the two or three of my own countrymen and countrywomen who may feel that that is the word they wanted to hear, and who will accept it as a message to their hearts and reason without caring whether God chooses a sage or a blockhead to send it by.

‘I have run on at a terrible length, but I wanted to explain myself to you, who have comforted me so much with your cheering words and acts.

‘May God bless you for all the love you show to others, with the full revelation of His own.’

CHAPTER VII.

“Our grasp of the truth can never be worth much; it is the grasp of the truth upon us that men are willing to die for.”—Mr. R. H. Hutton, ‘The Incarnation,’ in Tracts for Priests and People.

1855. DEATH OF ARCHDEACON HARE—THE CRIMEAN WAR—WORKING WOMEN’S CLASSES—LONG CORRESPONDENCE WITH MR. KINGSLEY ON DOUBTS OF VARIOUS KINDS—FOREIGN TOUR—THE SUNDAY QUESTION.

To Mr. Daniel Macmillan. ‘January 24, 1855.

‘You will, I am sure, be grieved to hear that the battle is over with my dear brother Julius Hare. He died yesterday morning. My whole life for the last eighteen years had been closely bound up with his, and nearly every joy or sorrow I have had has been connected with his home and with him.’

To his Wife.

‘Hurstmonceux Rectory, January 29, 1855.

We have reached this desolate house—more desolate than I had even thought of. Esther is said to be rather better. George Bunsen and Arthur Stanley were in the train with us, as well as Mr. Hull. I cannot tell you the sadness which seems to rest on this place. It makes one feel that one’s home must be elsewhere. All the rooms are so full of recollections and associations, but the spirit of them is gone. God bless you.’

‘MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

‘February 2, 1855.

Hearty thanks for both your very kind letters. Hare’s death is more to us, and I think more to the Church than even we thought it would be. We scarcely knew what his genial spirits and look were to us, or how much there was in his deepest heart which was receiving good and scattering good. His last months were very satisfactory witnesses of the man by the unvarying patience, cheerfulness and thankfulness which he was manifesting, without one false or affected or canting word in the midst of unusual suffering. In his last days he was so utterly wasted and prostrated that he could do no more than show tenderness and affection to all about him. It is some pleasure to me that the last book he gave to the person whom he loved almost next to his wife, was my book on Sacrifice, and that he expressed a pleasure in it to which he had a good right, as it was only a flower out of a seed which he had planted himself. The clergy in the archdeaconry, from the highest Tractarian down to the strongest Evangelical, are now expressing their affection for him, and their belief that he did them a good which they could have got nowhere else. So that life has come out of death, after all.

‘And so it will out of the miserable mistakes and disasters of this war. What a heart there seems to be in the poor starving soldiers, if there is ever such a feeble, to be I hope in God’s good time a broken and contrite, one—in us!

‘Verily He has been educating them, whatever we have been doing. We shall find out in time that all we have to do is to work with His teaching and not against it. We shall have to give up a multitude of our fine plans, but let the good conquer, as that orthodox Christian and true Gospel preacher Æschylus said some thousand years ago.* Oh that my lips were unstopped to preach that gospel in the strength of a manifested and crucified and risen Christ which he preached in the belief of Him before His incarnation!’

* In a chorus of the Agamemnon, which my father was fond of quoting; vide p. 548 of this vol. and the note.

To Baron Bunsen.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND, ‘21 Queen Square, February 14, 1855.

‘I have ventured to send you a volume I published towards the end of last year, on Sacrifice. I have some hesitation in doing so, not only when I recollect the splendid collection of volumes on philology, history, and theology which you left with me last summer, but from knowing how much thought you have devoted to this subject and how certain you are to consider my treatment of it narrow and unsatisfactory. I do not like, however, to seem as if I distrusted your toleration and kindness, which I have so largely experienced, and this volume will have some claim on your sympathy that may compensate for its own defects, as it was one of the last books which Julius read. That gives it an interest for me which I do not feel in any other book I have written. In fact, as I have said, the idea of it is contained in his own sermon on self-sacrifice, though I am most careful also to explain that he was not responsible for the theology of it, or for any of the opinions to which you, as a philosopher, would object.

‘Great as the satisfaction is of speaking of him to those who loved him and will not mistake gratitude and affection for party sympathy, I believe it is as great a duty for me to be silent, or almost silent, about him publicly. All the schools amongst us, even some of the most extreme of each, are now paying homage to his memory and mourning over him. Our men of letters will also claim him as one of themselves, some of yours will not forget that he was the translator of Niebuhr and the defender of Luther. I trust, and I am sure, that those who were united with him by very sacred ties, will not disturb this feeling by introducing their own regard, far less by claiming him as in any sense belonging to them. You and others may have had a natural fear that, as the English public absurdly mixed me up with him as if we were of the same school, I should try to bring him down to the level of my notions and put him forth as the champion and representative of them. I think I may promise you that you shall have no cause to make this complaint. In immeasurably the largest portion of his treasures of thought and knowledge I had not even the slightest share, and I should consider it a positive crime to make any plea of attachment, which so many might make equally, or any accidental advantages, an excuse for lowering him in the opinion of those whom he honoured and loved. I am sure my sister will entirely share these feelings, so that I do trust your mind will be relieved from any anxiety on this point.

‘Your interest in England, which must have been greatly shaken by what you have seen of its weakness and have heard of its more recent sins, will be further diminished by the loss of one of those whose face was a cordial to every one, and was always turned to you with the greatest affection and reverence. I heartily rejoice with you that you have found a home where you can pursue all the studies that are most congenial to you. But those who have received continual and undeserved kindness from you may be permitted to look back upon past days, and to wish, for the sake of their country as much as for their own, that you were not separated from us. Our spiritual battles are likely to be at least as serious as our material ones, and God knows how serious they are. . . .

‘Affectionately yours.’

To his Wife.

‘March 22, 1855.

‘You and Elizabeth * must not think me a great heretic because I try to explain two sides of a truth and sometimes put one part of it forward and sometimes another. If you read the Gospel you must see that our Lord speaks of a woman, a child of Abraham, being fast bound by Satan for eighteen years because she had some aggravated kind of rheumatism or paralysis ; that is one part of the truth which must not be hidden, and which is quite necessary in order that we may not charge God foolishly as the author of evil, or may not pretend to think that pain and suffering are not evil when our hearts tell us they are; the other is, that all these evils—the very worst—are permitted that the work of God may be manifested in us; that He allows us to suffer in order that He may call forth faith in us, and so bring us to a better health and diviner life; that all sorrow is redeemed by the sorrow of Christ, that the devil is foiled every way, when he seemed to be strongest. My conscience bears me witness that I have been as zealous to assert one of these principles as the other; but if I find either suppressed, I know the one that seems to be exalted will suffer, and I am bound to bring the other prominently forward. We can never get comfort by hiding any fact. God's revelation will explain all facts if we will allow it to do so.'

* Miss Houldsworth, afterwards wife of Rev. S. Clark.

' March 26, 1855.

' Yesterday I preached the sermon about dear Mansfield. There was a gathering of all his friends, and they received the Communion. We had therefore the best kind of intercourse.

* * * * *

' You will not doubt that on the 25th, as I preached on "those that sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him," another form was more present to me than his of whom I was more directly preaching.'

To Mrs. Augustus Hare.

' MY DEAR MRS. AUGUSTUS,

' May 5, 1855.

' I cannot tell you what a joy it was to receive your beautiful letter, or how much Georgina and I both felt the exceeding kindness of your words. They were the most soothing we could have heard, bringing back the sorrows and blessings of that time, none of which are gone by, and making us feel how the love that was then, is now, and ever shall be [was shown in both sorrows and blessings]. Your letter is a witness to us of it; may God reward you for it, by giving you a deeper and deeper apprehension of His own. I do hope you are feeling greater strength of body, and that the spring will bring to you all spring life. It should be a witness to us all of life coming out of death. We have seen even a greater miracle, life in death, which is Christ's own miracle, the fruit of His Passion and Resurrection. May God bless you always.

‘Your affectionate Friend.’

When once the Working-Men's College was well launched he became very eager to carry out some similar work for women. After much discussion, a series of lectures were delivered by him and by friends. These were afterwards published under the title of ‘Lectures to Ladies on Practical Subjects.’ Of these the first, delivered on May 21, 1855, was a lecture of his own on a “Plan of a Female College for the Help of the Rich and the Poor.” Classes for women were started at the Working-Men's College, and for some years were carried on with fair success.

To Rev. C. Kingsley.

‘2 Waterloo Crescent, Dover, August 4, 1855.

‘When I wrote to you the other day, I did not allude to the book on nature of which you spoke, though I had seen it, because I did not think that the book said anything which you have not heard a thousand times, and have not said to yourself tens of thousands; and therefore I think all its influence upon your mind came from its being the echo of something which was there before. Now of that, as I said, I am a very unfit judge; I have to fight with the devil, sometimes very close combats indeed. I am liable to a spiritual wickedness which seems to me infinitely more horrible than any submission to the world can be; but to that in the ordinary sense of the word (in the sense which implies some powerful attraction by the world, either natural or human) I am certainly less exposed than many, and especially than you. What danger then there is in my attempting to talk of what I feel and know so little! How certain you would be to detect my blunders, and without laughing at them, to say, "All this is very well for a mystic who knows nothing of what is going on in the earth beneath and the waters under the earth—but what is it to me?" If you have not had such thoughts yet, and you certainly have, you will have them in swarms; and why shall I provoke the swarms to settle, not on me, but on you, and on many a good and blessed thing beside?

There are few writings I have learnt more from, than your article on Raleigh. It is not all true, not perhaps quite half, but there are some parts of it which are very, very true, and the conception of it is right from beginning to end. It is the right way of contemplating the life of a man; I am certain that it is. We have a Father and He is watching over us. But let us believe that He is not, and that the world and nature are, and that we are only men when we identify ourselves with them and lose ourselves in them; then the cup becomes dry, we taste more of the dregs than the wine, and then comes the old cry, "How many hired servants have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger." Well! that is for the free and brave spirits of the earth. I have never known the sweet before the garbage, but I have tasted that in its worst form, of disappointed vanity, suspicion of others, incapacity for believing and loving, inward atheism. And so I believe somehow the Father brings all back somewhat by the same road, though our wanderings have been different, and some have known much more of inward evil, and others more of the blessings which are meant for us when we are fit for them. I am a hard Puritan, almost incapable of enjoyment, though on principle justifying enjoyment as God's gift to His creatures, and though I try to feel no grudge against those who have that which my conscience tells me it is not a virtue but a sin to want. God has given you infinite faculties of enjoyment. But He has given you with these the higher trust of being manly and of caring for your fellow-men and their miseries and sins. What I fear (perhaps most unreasonably) for you is, that the first gift should devour the second, that your sympathy with what is beautiful in nature and human society should make you less able to stand out against them, more tolerant of that which is eating into the hearts of individuals and nations. Godliness, I am certain, is the true support of manliness. The belief that the Son of God has interfered for His creatures, and has grappled with their sin and death, is the one protection of nations and men against sloth, effeminacy, baseness, tyranny. Oh, don't think it is a vulgar thing to be a preacher or even a priest, and a fine thing to be an artist. If you do, you will not be a true artist, but an artificer to please the world. And do not think that the way of resisting devil's worship is to deny any of the great facts and laws of humanity, which have been turned to the devil's use, but to claim them from him.

✓ 'A finished reconciliation and atonement is the one answer to the scheme of men for making atonement; if you part with it, all superstitions, all Moloch cruelties, will reproduce themselves; and you will try your natural incantations against them in vain. If you knew what bitter repentances I have had to suffer for hard words spoken in former days, to friends whom I might have helped if I had been wiser and gentler, you would believe that I do not write these words to you without tremblings. I have well deserved to alienate all whom I love, and with many I have succeeded rather too well. But I have such confidence in your truthfulness, that, if I had none in your affection, I think I should still have run the risk of seeming to send you a lecture rather than a letter. I do so the more boldly because I know that I am not pleading my own cause, except as it is yours, for I repeat what I said before, that the time is come when you ought to feel yourself, and to make the people understand, that you are not tied to any maxims of mine, and that if you have received anything from me, it has been in the way of honest merchandise, the balance of trade, if accounts were fairly examined, being all on my side.

'Ever yours affectionately.'

‘2 Waterloo Crescent, Dover, August 7, 1855.

‘MY DEAR DEAR KINGSLEY,

‘God bless you for the comfort you have given me; for comfort unspeakable it is, though I know what pain you are suffering, and though I think I could go through something to deliver you from it. But I am sure in my inmost heart that you are true to yourself and to God, and I am sure that He will guide you into all truth: all the more because you have to pass through storms and darkness on the way to it. Do not be in the least disturbed because books of mine about sacrifice, or anything else, do not satisfy you, or show you the way out of your confusions. Why should they? Is not the death of Christ, and your death and mine, a depth immeasurably below my soundings? And what have I done, if I have done anything truly or honestly, but beseech people not to try and measure it, but simply cast themselves upon the love of God which is manifested in it, and trust it when there is nothing else in Heaven above or earth beneath to rest upon? It is simply in despair that I have betaken myself to any rock, and what can I say but it is there, and hold fast to it, though I and all the world should be lost out of sight, or go to the bottom?

‘I have felt something of what you are feeling, though less intensely, because my nature is so much colder. But I am certain we shall be able to testify against statesmen, bishops, and all that are false to our country in her hour of need, just in proportion as we discern and feel all their sins in ourselves, and are conscious that they are destroying our own souls, as well as the soul of England. Then we shall become priests indeed and shall confess for them as well as for ourselves, and shall feel our need, as none can teach it us, of a sacrifice to present for the whole world. What an ass I should be if I were in a hurry to cram my thoughts about that down your throat, when God is teaching you His thoughts and His love about it, so far more thoroughly and inwardly. It is a burning fiery furnace we are going through in this war. I see it, and in some degree I feel it, and the Son of God, I believe and trust, is with us in the midst of it.

‘And I think with you of darker days to come. I speak of them sometimes to my children; but oftener of a brighter day that I think for them will rise out of the darkness, and which we, though we may have left the earth, may share with them. The day of Christ in a better sense than all our prophets dream of, is surely at hand. And we may wait for it—would that I did—as men wait for the morning. In the meantime let us not be cast down by anything, even by our own misdoings, failures, evil. The good is mightier than that evil and all others. And it will be shown to be mightier to our nation and to all mankind. I was cast down by many things—not least by hearing that poor harlequin priest Gavazzi utter his truths and lies and exhibit his clever pantomime, and utter his blasphemous prayers, last night to an admiring audience here. But your letter came in to assure me that there is reality and earnestness and hope, and God at the bottom of all. So let us praise Him in the midst of the fires.

‘Ever most lovingly yours.’

To Miss Williams Wynn.

‘Zurich, August 23, 1855.

*

*

*

*

*

‘It is the great struggle of every time to realise the union of the spiritual and eternal with the manifestations of it in time; now the first is forgotten for the second, now the second in the first—each perishes by the loss of the other, but in one time the difficulty is greater on this side, in another on that. We must have the eternal which our fathers nearly forgot; we are seizing it with a violence which makes us throw aside what they knew and felt to be unspeakably precious; we shall find that we must take their bequest or give up our own purchase. But we must believe that through whatever conflicts—and terrible they must be—we are to reach a fuller and brighter discovery of Him who was from the beginning, than the ages that were before us. May God help us to hold fast what we have, and assuredly more will be given us.'

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'Zurich, August 29, 1855.

'It seems a natural thing to write to you from the place in which Zwingli fought with words, and near which he died in an actual battle with swords. He never was a chief hero of mine, yet I should be glad to be such a man and to have such an end. My wife has had just a glimpse of the real Alps, and as yet only a glimpse; for she has had a serious attack of illness here, but she wonders at what she has seen as much as I could desire, and is silent in her wonder. To-morrow we hope to get into a higher region; our kind and sensible doctor here has recommended us a place above Zug, as he says Zurich is too relaxing. We shall then, I hope, get to the lake of the four cantons, which I saw fifteen years ago, and which I should like to be thoroughly intimate with. I saw Bunsen at Heidelberg on Sunday week. He spoke much of you and your doings. I think he is suffering from want of outward work; . . . he is a most cordial, genial man, and I trust his swarming thoughts will some day find a centre.

I sometimes feel, as I think you do, that we are fallen on very evil days, and that it is harder to be right and do right now than in any other day. Perhaps it is; but yet I do not wish myself or you or any one back in the days of Elizabeth; I believe in my inmost heart that these of Victoria are better, because they are more difficult, because a mightier problem is to be solved now than could be solved then. That was what I meant when I said I thought your article on Raleigh was right, but not all right, thoroughly right in its view of the way in which God trains a man, and in its vindication of an age which has been disparaged; imperfect in so far as it seemed to make that age too much a standard of what ours ought to be. No! it did its work; it bequeathed its treasure. Let us hold fast both, and resolve that we will do a work, and, if God permits it, bequeath a treasure. The union of nations, the fellowship of Christendom, the meaning of humanity, this we cannot have if we lose the national spirit of Elizabeth's days, and also of Cromwell's days; but neither Elizabeth nor Cromwell can help us to discern what these mean, which God certainly will teach us if we will learn. And I think He will teach us this by teaching us more than we have known of Himself, as the ground of humanity, as the Creator of the universe. With that lesson He will send us, I think, a revelation of the meaning of Christ's death as the bond of humanity which will justify all that our fathers were taught of it, and remove those inventions with which they overlaid their deep inward convictions. Such is the faith which grows on me with the discovery of my own sins, and of their identity with the sins of the world, and with the certainty that only the new and divine man by bearing them can take them from me. This is a long prose, but it is my fiftieth birthday; and I am claiming the rights of a half century of existence of blundering. Some time or other, perhaps, I shall hear from you. Poste Restante, Lucerne, I think, will find us; I had a half hope of a line from you at Heidelberg. But, being myself the worst correspondent in Europe, I should not be the least surprised if you find a much better use of your time and pen. I long much to hear how Mrs. Kingsley is, and that all of you are thriving at Eversley, so long as you may safely stay there. I was glad to have that glimpse of you at Ludlow's wedding.*

‘Ever yours affectionately.

‘P.S. I do not think I quite go along with you in what you say of Goethe. He seems to me the most perfect specimen of a genus of which I do not desire to see the multiplication, but which in itself is very valuable. The age of mere self-culture is over; but we must not lose the lessons it taught.

* Rather a characteristic reference to a wedding of a niece of Mr. Ludlow's, at which he and Mr. Kingsley had met.

And Goethe was entirely a Protestant against the bookishness of Germany in behalf of life.'

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'Lausanne, September 24, 1855.

Thank you very much for your letter. It is exceedingly kind of you to tell me just what you are thinking about the Bible or Greek myths, or anything. May I tell you, with the like frankness, that I knew from past experience that such thoughts must come to you and must for a time get great dominion over you? Why was it you believed in the Old Testament? Not because you had heard theories about inspiration, or cared a farthing for them, but because the book spoke words to you about a deliverer of you and a deliverer of the people, which no Greek myths spoke. You told the people that the Bible was their book, that, whether it was ante-Babylonian or post-Babylonian, it testified that this voice said out of every burning hill, out of the thunder and lightning, "I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the house of bondage." Now there come times to all of us—there has come such a one to you—when we wish the people at the devil, when we would like to forget all that we have ever said or thought about them. And there are, alas, times when we do not care much about a Deliverer for ourselves, when we like gods but we would just as soon be without God. Don't suppose I mean you when I say we. I mean that I have passed months, perhaps years, in that kind of condition; I think I owe you very much for having brought me out of it and given me a hearty interest in the Demus, if I never worshipped or wished to enthrone it. And oh! I know well how at such times one would give the world to be a great man, to be unlike other men, especially parsons, to have a way of one's own; but how little one cares to be a man, to claim one's place in a kind. I never had your temptations to feel this. I have nothing of the heroic in me, and I have never had the opportunity, if I had the power, to be anything but one of the people. But the Devil, though he has not come to me as an angel of light, but in his proper person with a switch tail and horns and hoofs, has come to me and has made me indifferent to freedom, ready for any chains of silk or of iron. The Old and New Testament, I can say it, have broken those chains asunder for me, have given me a right to say on some Easter morning,

“ ‘Hier bin ich Mensch, hier darf ich seyn.’ ”

“ And then all Greek myths and Greek songs have seemed to me very wonderful, not bringing freedom, but expressing the aspiration for it; showing a ladder set up on earth though lost in the clouds, and not reaching to heaven. How earnestly I wish to read the lesson in every one of them, and in all Art and Nature, I cannot tell you. But I am sure I shall not,—I am sure they will all become dreary and dead to me after a little while, if I give up the Bible for the sake of them, killing the hen to get the golden egg. It was needful for you, I am sure, to pass through this condition of mind; you could not do the work you have to do without it, and God will bring you out of it. But it will be by teaching you to love the people again, to feel that the best thing for any of us is to live and die for them; that all doubts are sacred, even the most atheistical which affect their hearts, but that the doubts of the refined, of those who want a law and a gospel for their own circle, are not sacred at all, but very contemptible, doubts which they must keep their own pet parsons and led captains and fashionable novelists to solve, but which have nothing to do with life and business and humanity, and which those who care for these had best let alone altogether.

“ P—— is ruining himself with making a Christianity to fit both German professors and London dandies. What good will it do to human beings who must live and die? ”

Among the teachers who had volunteered to join the Working Men's College were two French Republican refugees, whose views, both in political and religious matters, proved to be of a very violent type. One of them—M. Talandier—was subsequently French teacher at the Military College at Sandhurst, and holds now a position of some distinction in the Chamber of Deputies. The following two letters explain sufficiently for the purposes of this book, the circumstances under which these two men were excluded from the Council of the Working Men's College.

To Rev. J. Ll. Davies.

‘Boulogne-sur-Mer, October 19, 1855.

‘An article which I read in the Times yesterday about Talandier has troubled me greatly. I do not so much fear the effect of the mad and wicked doctrines to which he seems to have given his name, in bringing our college into disrepute—for that I suppose it is in already through me—but from any influence they may have upon our pupils. I do not think we can be the least called upon to come forward for the purpose of repudiating him, which would be very unkind and ungracious to a poor man who has given us his services freely. I will willingly bear the discredit of having accepted them, and should wish to thank him cordially for the help he has rendered us. As to the future, I do not see my way clearly—knowing nothing of the circumstances; but perhaps the matter will be taken out of our hands, if, as the newspapers seem to say, Lord Palmerston is going to send him away.

‘If you wish me to deliver anything of an inaugural address, will you let me know, and tell me whether I might make it—of course without any allusion to what has passed—a statement of my own feeling about the true means of emancipating the nations, a subject which has been much pressed upon my mind during this journey? I feel more than I ever did how entirely the loss of a belief in a living God—chiefly through the sins of the priesthood—has been the loss of freedom to Christendom, and how impossible it is that the freedom should return without the faith. I have much to say to you on this subject. I think we must sigh and cry for the Reformation, not of our own country only, but of all nations, much more than we have done, and that the time of struggle and deliverance must be at hand. But I should like your advice about the possibility of bringing it—which I could do without anything which would sound very theological—before our people.’

‘Boulogne, Sunday Evening, October 21, 1855.

‘MY DEAR DAVIES,

‘Since I wrote to you I have seen extracts from Talandier’s speech, as published by the refugees themselves in the Jersey paper. It seems to me clear from these, that he has disclaimed all association with any Englishmen, except Chartists, emphatically with all Englishmen who believe in any Trinity but his. I do not see how, unless we accept these conditions, he can honestly work with us. Clearly, therefore, the programme ought not to appear with his name. I do not know whether the Jourdain who was in the chair at the meeting is our Jourdain; if he is, of course the same rule applies to him. I need not tell you that I should count it absurd to disclaim his statements, because, unless we are living to refute them, unless the aim of our whole education and thought is to establish what he denies, all our professions and acts are a lie. This we must make our people clearly understand, without saying a hard word of him; indeed, while we make the fullest allowance for the influences which may have urged many such as he is, to madness, and while we thank him for the help he has given us, I should even wish, of course privately, if it were possible, to make him some pecuniary return for his services, that there might be no sense of that kind of debt. Could that be done? Of course not from the college! But my object in writing this line is to express my decided opinion that the programme should not have his name, and that another should be published if it has appeared. I will write to him, if that is thought the best course, as soon as I come to London, explaining what has been done. The letter should be translated, that its meaning may be unmistakable. My great wish is that the transaction should be between us and him, and that all explanation should be addressed to him and to our own people. The newspapers, if they take it up against us, should not, I think, be meddled with in the least, till the other steps have been taken. I hope to go on Wednesday; if it is necessary, I will come even if I am obliged to leave Mrs. Maurice and my nieces.'

To Rev. C. Kingsley.

'21 Queen Square, October 26, 1855.

'You have taken my surly words, dearest Kingsley, in a spirit which makes me ashamed of having ever uttered them. And yet I am not sorry I did; for they have called forth the very answer that I should most have desired. I did not like to hear you talking "Victorious analysis" about books of scripture and Babylonian periods, not because I do not think there are persons who may busy themselves with such matters, indeed have no vocation for any other; but because I believe that such men do not belong to this time and are not occupied with the questions of this time, which all point to the discovery of the grounds of unity in books and among men: and because I am satisfied that you being emphatically a man of this time, would have only the use of your left hand in dealing with such subjects, and may have the full free use of your sword arm when you are devoting yourself to the other. And therefore most heartily do I rejoice to find you again working at that old puzzle about "made"* which you rightly think we have not got to the bottom of yet. It deserves all sifting that we may be sure we are not cheating ourselves and cheating mankind of that which is most precious, and that we are not making words mean what they do not mean. It is a point of infinite importance, and if the Catechism stand in the way of our acknowledging the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, concerning the state of men in the sight of God, the Catechism must go. You know, I think, how much it has been the effort of my life to assert a ground for men's sonship to God, which is deeper than any external rite and which is grounded on the eternal relation of God to man in the Living Word. But you do not know how much all the thoughts of my mind about our own people and my relation to them have turned upon this point, and how much more I have been led to meditate upon it lately in connection with the people of other lands whom I have wished to know and care for, between whom and me there has seemed to be a great gulf fixed, and whose condition appears to be even more slavish and hopeless than that of the serfs of our own soil. Thinking upon these things, and, more than all, groaning in spirit as I have seen the priests in the churches, who seem as if they were existing to bear witness that there is not a fellowship between earth and Heaven and that God and man are not reconciled, I have asked myself whither all things are tending and what the movements of these sixty years have brought forth? Deeper and deeper would have been my despair if I had not been led to feel assuredly that every one of these movements has been a step in the revelation to men that they are not animals plus a soul, but that they are spirits with an animal nature; that the bond of their union is not a commercial one, not submission to a common tyrant, not brutal rage against him; but that it does rest and has always rested on a spiritual ground; that the sin of the Church—the horrible apostasy of the Church—has consisted in denying its own function, which is to proclaim to men their spiritual condition, the eternal foundation on which it rests, the manifestation which has been made of it by the birth, death, resurrection and ascension of the Son of God, and the gift of the Spirit.

* "Wherein I was made a member of Christ, &c."—The Church Catechism.

‘Well! this being my most inward conviction, and feeling every day that the call is greater to bear this testimony to the people and that among them (I had almost said only among them), there is a hope of its being listened to—I have considered what the position of the Church of England is and whether these formularies of hers are in the way of that which seems to me the message that the time is crying out for. And the conclusion I have come to thus far is, that they may be in the way if we from heedlessness or unmanliness in the use of them allow them to be so; that they may be quite infinite helps if, instead of acting as the Scotch did in the case of Campbell, we say boldly that the Bible interprets the formularies, not the formularies the Bible, and that God Himself is above both, though we and our thoughts which He is seeking to educate and raise may be far beneath both.

“How do I apply this in the particular case we are busy with? We are made sons of God in baptism. “There,” says the Puseyite, “is not that conclusive? How dare you go farther? You have spoken the words. Now talk about an original sonship—a sonship in Christ before all worlds if you please.”

“Yes, my dear friend, and I do please, and I shall talk of that, and I shall tell men, as the Apostles told them, to believe in Christ as the Son of God in whom they are called to be sons. And if you stop my doing so, I shall have to ask you what you know about this sonship, what it means except a certain construction of letters of the alphabet, except I get it interpreted to me in this way.” That is my way of meeting him, and I do not mean to say more to him at present because it is much better that he should be a little perplexed and should ask God to help him in working out the problem, than that I should show him the solution of it. But to you I will say more: I will ask you whether, if you got rid of this word made, you must not have some other which was equally imperfect, equally onesided; whether you would not get a little bit more of another half of the truth and lose a great slice of what we have now? Let me explain by a parallel instance. You call a bastard a natural child. Is not that an utterly unsatisfactory adjective! Are not children born in wedlock born according to nature? Is that a mere legal title? How shockingly marriage is degraded by such a thought! How glad you are to escape from it sometimes, so that even in legal documents one sometimes hears of children naturally begotten of a true wife! Well then, this expression must be explained, interpreted, even at times almost contradicted for the sake of high and practical principles. But would it be desirable to expel that expression from the language? No! we should lose a great deal if we did. We should lose the testimony that there is a higher bond between human beings, spiritual creatures, than the natural one; that the natural depends upon this: that to follow nature is not to be in the true sense a man who is above nature—of this marriage testifies. The children born of the true wife are not natural, the law calls them legitimate for it cannot give them another name. We see in legitimacy the sign and pledge of that which is as much above law as above nature.

‘Apply this. You are not satisfied with the word made children of God in baptism. You ought not to be. But you wish it away. What follows? You lose the witness of men being above nature, above their law of the ordinary birth; you lose a witness of their being the spiritual creatures you want to affirm that they are. The made sounds formal, sounds legal, just as legitimate does. But I do not know if we exchanged it for any other that we should not slide back into the very notion against which our whole lives are a fight, that we are in our flesh, merely as animals, sons of God, which is in fact the Rousseau, French Revolution inversion of the Christian Universality and leads to unlimited selfishness, to every man’s hand being against his brother’s.

‘I think it is the hardest of all struggles for you with your right and eager assertion of the worth of man’s animal nature, not to confound it with the spirit and so to unsay all you mean to say. I have felt the difficulty too, but more in a logical way; less as one in which my affections and passions were interested. You do not know how much that “made,” though it galls you, may have helped to keep you straight and to preserve you from the naturalism into which you always fear to fall. Meantime, I am quite certain that you will be taught to preach a Gospel to men that they are spirits and that they are born of God, and that it is their duty to believe so. If baptism were in the way of such a proclamation I could throw it off as St. Paul did circumcision. And perhaps one may have to speak words which will give as much offence to those who say they are Jews but are not, and to die as he died. But I am sure baptism is the witness to men of a real spiritual fellowship which is to embrace all nations into itself when its meaning is truly declared, and therefore it is more precious to me than ever it was.

'God bless you and all yours. My best love to them.'

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'December 7, 1855.

'I have sent the preface to Clay without alterations. It seemed to me quite suitable for the purpose, so far as I can judge of it from what I hear. Macmillan speaks of the book* itself as very delightful.

'The Sermons† I like exceedingly, at least all I have read. I think the style is even better than in the earlier volumes, and the Gospel more distinct. I have heard only one complaint, which I think has some foundation. It is said that you glorify the past, and denounce "now-a-days" too much. The temptation I know is great, for I have felt, and do feel it. But I think it must be resisted. The former days were not better than these, though we feel their strength as we cannot feel that which is latent among our contemporaries. I have been to Cambridge and preached twice there; the last time to a quite overwhelming congregation. I have been much cheered with all I saw of the men. I think the working college will do them at least as much good as the working-men.

'My wife is laid up with rheumatism, of which I have had enough lately to remind me that I am become an old man. The more should I endeavour, as you are doing, to keep up sympathy with children.'

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'December 26, 1855.

'I began a long letter to you on the day I received yours about the history; but it was too serious a subject to speak of hastily, and I laid my discourse by. Thank you heartily for the note of yesterday. May Christmas bring all good with

* 'The Heroes.'

† 'Sermons for the Times.'

it, past, present, and future, to you and your wife and your children.

‘I have often longed to speak out what I think about the Civil Wars. But I can do nothing except in hints. I have none of the qualities of a historian. You, I think, have a great many, and the most important; and if you can concentrate them upon this wonderful period, you may confer a quite inestimable blessing on your country. It is clear that there is a cry for history in our day such as there has not been in any other. Macaulay’s success might not be decisive of that point, but Grote’s certainly is. However little hope there may be among us, we have at least a great longing to recover our memory. I have, I suspect, a more natural affection both for Puritanism and Quakerism than you have. I take the former, without your qualification. A strong spice of Calvinism is essential to it. You must swallow that pill and make as few wry faces as you can. But to swallow Laud and Charles the First! That, I confess, is a difficulty. As for treating them impartially, it is out of the question. Impartiality is for such men as Hallam; you and I do not affect it. But there is a certain amount of affection which you must cultivate for them, and a certain understanding of the causes of their infinite blunders and wrong doings, and this will be hardly possible if you fling yourself into the work with a deadly determination to slaughter the Anglicans of our day. You will slaughter them much more effectually by justifying their foes than by throwing stones at their friends, though no one feels more than I do how great the temptation is to that course, for Laud’s pedantry and Charles’s lying are more intolerable to me than I can well express. The reason I say this, is that I believe if you can find the centre of the movements of this great period, the Episcopalian coxcombry, the Puritanical exclusiveness, the Quaker denial of institutions will all interpret themselves to you, and will each illustrate the purpose and order of God, quite as much as the faith and unbelief, the strength and weakness of His creatures. . . .

‘Carlyle is the beginner of a restoration in history, for he believes in a God who lived till the death of Oliver Cromwell—an incredible advance, even upon the better Whig and better Tory historians, who though they worshipped God, worshipped Him only as represented in the House of Commons or the King. I agree with Carlyle that Cromwell on the whole understood his time better than all who lived in it; that he discovered the godly idea which was underneath the reverence for laws and charters in the Parliament, and that which was underneath the monarchical idolatry in the Cavaliers; that he swept away the pedantries of both, and brought out the truth of God’s government in its nakedness. This is honour enough for any man, and all praise to Carlyle for assigning it to its rightful owner.

‘But you who do not think that the belief of Cromwell in God exalted Him to a throne, which was not His before, and which has not been His since; you who think that He is, and was, and is to come, should be able to express that conviction by showing what worth there was in the legalism of Parliament, what worth in the hereditary succession of kings as different testimonies of the continuance of that righteous order and authority, which Cromwell affirmed to have an existence of its own apart from all earthly symbols and representations, which each of the parties was confounding with its symbol and representation.

‘I don’t know whether I have made my meaning clear, or whether you will be able to get it clear by any defæcating processes; but if so, you will understand why I claim justice, not only for the chivalrous Royalist, not only for Strafford, whose thorough-going maxims and hatred of pedantry you will of course appreciate; but for the formalists or at least for that which their formalism signified, if they were not aware of it. Nothing, in my judgment, can be a more horrid or a more monstrous contradiction than the notion of forcing Episcopacy by a royal decree down the throats of the Scotch. Nothing more deserving of honour than their resistance, and the grounds on which they rested it. But Laud was right in thinking that the two countries must be united, and that there must be a spiritual basis for their union. He was right in thinking that Presbyterianism was no basis for such a union, and tended to undermine it.

‘Experience confirmed these opinions as much as it proved the absurdity and sinfulness of his practical measures. The moment the Scots set up Presbyterianism as the meaning and result of the covenant with God, which they had so manfully and truly asserted, that moment they became fools, and Cromwell was needed to show them up as fools to angels and men. How often will you have to change sides in this history, if you are determined to be consistent in the true sense of consistency!’

To Sir E. Strachey.

‘21 Queen Square, January 28, 1856.

* * * * *

‘I believe you are right that the belief of another unity than the Adamic would clear away a number of difficulties from the minds of scientific men. The one you speak of concerning natural immutability, and the relation of men to the other orders of creation, was well, earnestly, and courageously considered by the old schoolmen, little as they knew of modern discoveries. That doctrine of an inchoate humanity in the animals which Coleridge has expressed in a passage of the ‘Aids to Reflection’ that you will remember, I find the main one in an interesting treatise of Albertus Magnus.

‘Does your Arabic learning extend to Avicenna, Averroes, or any of the Moslem philosophers, who exercised so much influence on the thought of the West in the thirteenth century?’

To Mrs. Augustus Hare.

‘95 King’s Road, Brighton, January 31, 1856.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘I cannot tell you how grateful I felt and feel for your kindness in writing to me about the introduction to the Charges.* No testimony could be so valuable as yours, and you will not wonder that I should often have trembled while writing it, lest I should distort, as I knew I must enfeeble, some features of the character which I was trying to sketch. I felt the presumption of speaking of one whom I did not know, but I was representing Georgina as well as myself; and her exceeding love, and the pains she has taken to give me her impressions of the character, encouraged me to venture on the few words which could not be omitted, if I was to speak faithfully of Julius, who owed him so much more than I, or even his own pen, could express.

* His introduction to Archdeacon Hare’s Charges has several references to Mr. Augustus Hare, and a sketch of his character.

‘I am particularly thankful that what I said did not strike you in any point as wrong, however inadequate it must be. Yesterday * was indeed a solemn day to us all. The brightness of it here recalled vividly the sudden and unsurpassed beauty of those lanes in their snow a year ago, which we had seen before in very different circumstances, but once or twice in almost the same. Life and death seem strangely blended with all one’s thoughts of them, and of that churchyard; but life, thanks be to God, is stronger than death. I was sentenced to come here by my doctor, and the place has done me much good. I hope it has also been of use to Georgina, who, I think, would have been seriously ill, if we had remained in London. She sends her kindest love to you.’

To Rev. C. Kingsley.

‘June 3, 1856.

‘I am up to my ears in the schoolmen, and hoping earnestly for a speedy emancipation from them.

‘The part of my ‘Moral Philosophy’ which belongs to the middle ages has given me a good deal of trouble, as you may fancy, and ought to have given me a great deal more. One has the feeling, in writing it, that it ought to be done, though no one will read it, and I have the reward of having grown into an affection for my subjects which I never expected to have.

* Archdeacon Hare’s funeral had taken place the year before on January

For all that, they would drive me mad if I were altogether shut up with them, and could not now and then breathe a little of our fresh London air. I have also been delivering myself of some sermons, which together make up a sort of commentary on St. John. I think he would set us all right if we did but believe that he means really what he says.

‘I am reading Froude’s history with great interest, and I hope some profit. After all, how nearly his view of Henry accords with that which Shakespeare got out of the Chronicles by mere intuition. I dare say it is in the main right. But in Froude as in all Oxford men, though far less than in most, there is that strange belief in the dislocation of the past from the present, which I would rather die than accept a tittle of. His style is generally most delightful, far the best historical style for our times that I know; so equable and free from pretension and jauntiness.’

To Rev. S. Hansard.

‘June 5, 1856.

‘I have not seen the petition from the Lord’s Day Society, which you speak of.

‘I have seen other documents proceeding from the same quarter which have been unspeakably painful to me, because every quotation from Scripture which they contained—especially every quotation from the discourses of our Lord—was used, it seems to me, with reckless and profane indifference to its original meaning and application, as if the divine oracles, instead of being authorities to which we must bow, were mere instruments which we may compel to secure any temporary purpose that we consider holy.

‘This objection to the acts of the Lord’s Day Society, and the terrible suspicion which it involves that there must be something in our religious condition which is very like that of the Jews when they made the Sabbath day the main excuse for denying the Son of man, and the Son of God, and seeking to kill Him—has weighed so much upon my mind that I have not dared, nay, that I have scarcely been able to dwell upon those arguments, often of a very opposite kind, which are resorted to by the defenders of Sunday amusements.

‘I do feel the force of some of those arguments, such as those drawn from the present condition of the people, and from the possible hope of withdrawing them from the gin palace, very keenly; but they are balanced by others of nearly equal weight, and they are mixed with statements, mischievous, I think, from the half truth which is in them, to which I am less and less able to subscribe. When it is said that the Christian Sabbath is not a Jewish Sabbath, I admit the assertion altogether; but that is because I think it much higher and finer than the Jewish Sabbath, not poorer or of less perfect obligation.

‘When it is said that it does not rest upon a formal law, I admit it, just as I hold that Baptism and the Communion of the Lord’s Supper belong to the Gospel and not to the law, to the New Testament, and not to the Old, to the spirit and not to the flesh, and consider them more precious and more binding for that reason. And just as I seek for the groundwork of baptism in circumcision, and for the Lord’s Supper in the Passover, just as I could not understand the one without the other, or see what we have gained, if we had not the divine seed out of which the flower has developed itself to compare with it, so I could not understand the Christian Sabbath if I did not find the first form of it, and the statement of its permanent significance in the fourth commandment.

‘I look upon it as still expressing that union of rest and work which is implied in the constitution of the universe, and in the constitution of man; as still affirming that man’s rest has its foundation in God’s rest, man’s work in God’s work; as still proclaiming a common blessing to the master and the servant, and the cattle. I look upon it as still an ordinance connected with the nation and its holiness, declaring our nation, as it did the Jewish, to be holy and chosen, and consecrated to God. I look upon it in its Christian form as declaring that the union of God and man, which was set forth in the law, has been accomplished by the resurrection of our Lord, and that God can now rest in man and man in God.

‘Holding this to be so, I regard the Christian Sabbath or Lord’s Day as the great message to human beings—the great silent message which is mightier than words, but which words ought to interpret—concerning this reconciliation. I think the early reformers were indifferent to it, in part at least, because they did not heartily acknowledge a reconciliation of God with human beings, but only with believers or the elect. I think those who call themselves the successors of these reformers are teaching people to regard the Sabbath as a day of penance and sackcloth, because they do not believe in this reconciliation of God with mankind, and would not have it preached either silently or by the lips of God’s heralds. But I think there is a sense in our people that the Sabbath has some profound blessing for them which is latent under all the perversions of it; and that hence we may explain much of the passive as well as of the active opposition to what looks like an attempt to treat it as a day only or chiefly of bodily recreation.

‘If you ask me what seems to me our duty as clergymen, I should say, first of all to preach continually that reconciliation of God to man, and to take every opportunity of affirming that the Sabbath is a witness of it. Secondly, to vindicate by all possible ways the force of our Lord’s words respecting the Sabbath day, as not proclaiming certain allowable exceptions from the severe observation of it, but as asserting the essential meaning and character of it. He chose that day for healing the sick, surely to testify that the bodies of men are dear to Him, and that this day is especially to assert how dear they are. Thirdly, to combat vehemently the doctrine which is openly proclaimed both by laymen and clergymen, that our Lord’s words were suitable to His time, when Pharisaism was rampant, and are not suitable to ours, which are Latitudinarian; an accursed doctrine, to the application of which there are no limits, and which must subject the whole of the Gospel to our caprice.

Fourthly, to combat as vehemently the doctrine that He spent so many of His precious words and acts in merely vindicating a special exception to law, instead of declaring its essential force and meaning. Fifthly, on the strength of His teaching and example, to consider how we may best claim the Sabbath day as a practical instrument for benefiting men's physical as well as their spiritual condition, always endeavouring to show how one is related to the other, making all our acts not concessions or exceptions, but parts of one Gospel, and carefully adapting ourselves to English habits and local circumstances; neither condemning foreign practices, nor desiring the least to imitate them.

‘I do not say that such a protest as you speak of may not be one right means to these ends. Let us talk it over, determining not to shrink from any duty, but as little as possible to wound any Christian or honest feelings. When will you come and have it out?’

‘Ever yours affectionately.’

CHAPTER VIII.

“Every high-minded leader who gathers followers round him for any great purpose, when he calls to self-sacrifice and has no worldly rewards to offer, . . . in his degree winnows men.”

“He who, when goodness is impressively put before him, exhibits an instinctive loyalty to it, starts forward to take its side, trusts himself to it—such a man has faith, and the root of the matter is in such a man.—Ecce Homo.

HOME LIFE—PERSONAL CHARACTERISTICS, ETC.—1856—MOVES TO RUSSELL SQUARE—RETURNS TO QUEEN’S COLLEGE.

IN the early summer of 1856 my father moved to a much larger house, No. 5, Russell Square. Since his three nieces had come to live with him in March 1854, the house in Queen Square had been inconveniently small. His habits had in some respects undergone a considerable change since he came up to London. By nature he was the most hospitable of men, and gradually the shyness which when he first went to Guy’s had prevented him from seeing much of any but a few friends, had been so far overcome by his desire to have an open door for all mankind, that his acquaintance each year had multiplied at an ever increasing rate. From all parts of the world people who had heard of him through others were continually asking to be introduced to him. His universal habit on these occasions was to say, “Could you come and breakfast with me to-morrow morning?” I don’t think the invitation was ever given without a certain shyness and a hesitation, as though it was something of a liberty for him to take to ask any human being to come to his house. The habit was in reality, however, itself forced on him as much by his shyness as by his hospitality and by his kindness of feeling towards all men. He wanted something to break the ice and put him and his new acquaintance at ease precisely because he found it so hard to enter upon subjects that would be keenly interesting to both of them. The result was that what came among his friends to be known as "prophetic breakfasts" were ere long, after he had come up to Queen Square and during all the time that he lived at Russell Square, a feature of his life.

He was always an early riser. Hardly ever later than 6 A.M., often much earlier than that, the sound of the splash of the cold tub, which summer and winter, down to the end of his life, he invariably took both the first thing in the morning and the last at night, was to be heard, and a curiously pathetic almost agonised "shou-shou" followed, which seemed to tell that, for a frame that was kept so low as his by constant brain-work and a somewhat self-stinted diet, the shock was almost a penance endured rather than enjoyed. Immediately after dressing he settled down to work at whatever his special task for the time might be, though very frequently if one came into his room at all suddenly, the result was to make him rise hurriedly from his knees, his face reddened, and his eyes depressed by the intense pressure of his hands, the base of each of which had been driven and almost gouged into either eye-socket, the fingers and thumbs pressed down over forehead and head. The Greek Testament, open at some special point which had occupied him at the moment he kneeled down, lay on the chair before him; but as he rose the spirit seemed to have come back again into his face from the far-off region to which it had been travelling, and there was just the hint in the face of an involuntary sadness and almost of reproach that the spirit should be recalled from the intercourse it had been enjoying.* About 20 minutes to 8, with a small party from home, he started for the service at Lincoln's Inn, and was back about 9 for breakfast. In the earlier days at Queen Square his breakfasts

* Mrs. Maurice's note-book adds to this: "Whenever he woke in the night he was always praying. And in the VERY early morning I have often pretended to be asleep lest I should disturb him whilst he was pouring out his heart to God." "He never began any work or any book without preparing for it by prayer."

when he had friends with him were purely gatherings of men, his sister Priscilla having been completely confined to her bed.

At all times his evening meetings, both of the promoters, of his Bible-classes, and of some others, were presided over by himself, no lady being present. His friends had many stories against him as to their sufferings in consequence of that fact. On one occasion, when there was a larger gathering than usual, at one of the evening meetings of co-operators, there was, when the tea was poured out, a cry that they were all poisoned. On investigation it appeared that he had filled up the tea-pot so completely with tea leaves that the extract was unrecognisable as tea.

He was always at his best at a breakfast at which he had gathered various friends. The very variety and sometimes almost incongruity of the guests who came to them, gave scope to the unlimited sympathy and sympathetic power which enabled him to draw out the best of each. Whatever was the most interesting topic of the day in politics, literature or any other region, was sure to come uppermost, unless there was some more special subject that closely concerned his particular guest.

Usually after breakfast—which often, when he was free from lectures or other day duty, ran on into long talks and discussions till a late hour in the morning—he began dictating to his wife. Often when his subject had been worked up, and on a day on which he had not some other engagement, he continued dictating all day with only the interruption of luncheon till dinner at 6.30, which was his usual hour.

It was a very great relief to him to compose his books by dictation and to avoid the labour of mechanical writing. His usual manner of dictation was to sit with a pillow on his knees hugged tightly in his arms, or to walk up and down the room still clutching the pillow, or suddenly sitting down or standing before the fire with the pillow still on his knees or under his left arm, to seize a poker and violently attack the fire, then to walk away from it to the furthest end of the room, return, and poke violently at the fire, not unfrequently in complete unconsciousness of what he was doing, poking the whole of the contents of the fireplace through the bars into the fender. The habit of holding the pillow whenever he was engaged in excited talk dated from such early days, that one of his undergraduate Cambridge friends used to say that a black horse-hair pillow which he then had, always followed him about of itself. My mother in the Guy's days used to call such an one his "black wife." All the while he poured forth a continuous stream of words.

When, however, he took into his own hands, for looking over and correction, a passage which he had either written or dictated, the chances were very strong that half at least of it would be torn out, or erased and rewritten. All his manuscript is full of verbal corrections, erasures and rewritings on each separate page, and whole sections of each of the MSS. books are torn completely out. He never could be satisfied with the expression he had given to the thoughts he wished his words to convey.

If any one called to see him, no matter who it might be, he instantly stopped his work, whatever it might be, and went in to see the caller. I believe that his articles in the 'Politics for the People' must have contained some of the earliest protests in vigorous language against the absolute mischief and wrong of promiscuous almsgiving. Nevertheless, the habitual beggars very soon discovered that there was no house at which they were more sure of successful plunder. In each case similar incidents were repeated. He heard the beggar's story. He protested against the wrong they were doing in begging. He made earnest appeals to them against their course of life, and then he went upstairs to his wife, and confessed to her that he had thought that in this particular instance it was better to give something. Not unfrequently he had to go to her for money to give them, and often returned to find that the beggar had disappeared with a coat, hat or umbrella.

Though he was usually very silent about these experiences, there was one story which he was rather fond of telling. Some Frenchman who had come to him with one of the regular decayed-gentleman-foreigner stories, to whom he had finally given half-a-crown, left him disconcerted by remarking on receiving the money, "Monsieur, je suis humilié," i.e. at the smallness of the sum.

I do not remember his ever, when in London, going out for pure exercise, but probably his daily walk to and from Lincoln's Inn in the morning, and the frequent engagements he had in different parts of the town to which he usually walked, served him sufficiently for such health as he enjoyed. He so boasted of his good health, and so habitually acted as a man in strong health, that my own impression certainly had been that with the exception of a few attacks of lumbago or loss of voice, his general health was remarkably good. None of his pupils remember his missing a lecture. But Mrs. Maurice writes to me: "You are mistaken about his health. When I married he was suffering from tendency to a very dangerous malady which, if he had not married and had a wife to look after him, and get advice, would very probably have killed him in about two years. Mr. Headland [his doctor at the time] saved him. It was entirely for his health that we went abroad in 1850, to Eastbourne and Brighton three times, and various other places. He was subject to faintness, and four or five times was taken ill at parties. . . . Indeed, his overworked brain showed itself in many ways, amongst others by what he called lumbago."

He was distinctly below the middle height, not above 5 feet 7 inches, but he had a certain dignity of carriage despite the entire absence of any self assertion of manner, which in the pulpit, where only his head and shoulders were observable, removed the impression of small stature. His father had been a very small man, with an old-fashioned and extreme courtesy; his mother, a stately large woman of a specially venerable and dignified carriage. My father's manner was inherited almost exactly from his mother. He had a habit, however, when first starting from his house by himself, of going off at a run down the steps and for a certain distance afterwards, gradually subsiding into a walk. This habit was dropped towards the latter part of his life, but it had for many years rather the character of an involuntary burst of energy of the same kind as the fire-poking, than any indication of a disposition to mere hurry. It was almost painful to walk with him in any part of the town where it was necessary for him to ask his way. In the noisiest and most crowded places he would inquire his direction in the gentlest and most apologetic tone, perhaps of some bluff old costermonger woman, who, unaccustomed to hear such subdued language, would continue to shove her way along, utterly unconscious of having been addressed. He would instantly draw back as though he had been rebuffed in an intrusion which, on reflection, he felt to have been quite unwarrantable, and would watch for a more favourable opportunity of attracting the attention of some other passer-by. Much later in life, an acquaintance, whom he did not know to be present, records how one pouring wet day, when my father was sitting in a crowded omnibus, some old apple-woman came to the door looking for a seat, and how my father, an old man at the time, instantly got out on to the roof. It is quite certain that he would have done so at any time, but he would also have carefully demonstrated, if any one had detected him in the act, that there were most excellent reasons why it was the most natural thing in the world that he should get out into the rain, rather than some much younger man, who had no notion of doing so.

That of which it is hardest to give any adequate impression is the "stealth" of his "doing good" in all kinds of little ways all day long, in the small details of daily life. If anything went wrong, he was sure by some ingenious process or other to make out that he, himself, was the only person to blame for it. Always he was contriving to leave an impression favourable to one member of the household, of some act which another was disposed to resent, or he was arranging some special kindness of his own, the whole credit of which he contrived to leave to some one else. It was the continual tendency to take the heaviest load on his own shoulders, and to assign the lightest to others, all the while pretending and really persuading himself that he was not doing his fair share, that one knows not how to illustrate, because it happened always and in everything. Not a few of his letters would leave a quite false impression unless this tendency be understood. Thus his half quizzing letter to Sir E. Strachey (on p. 272, Vol. I.) on the subject of fasting, represents simply his unwillingness to prescribe rules for other men, and his equal unwillingness to break the command, not to appear to other men to fast. In practice, he carried to an extreme point his own fasting on all the days prescribed by the Church. Not unfrequently on Good Friday or other days, he palpably suffered from his almost entire abstinence from food; and at other times during the year he used to exercise the most curious ingenuity in contriving to avoid taking food without allowing his doing so to be observed.

On nearly the same principle as dictated his letter to Sir E. Strachey was his action, in another matter which arose, in the course of 1856, among those working-men who formed some of the earliest classes of the Working-Men's College. Some of them announced, in a rather aggressive manner, that they preferred taking a walk on Sunday to attending a place of worship, finding that they were the better for making that choice. Many of those at the meeting were either zealous churchmen or zealous dissenters, and the announcement was received with a shriek of indignation and horror by these. My father was appealed to by both. He made a speech at the moment, endeavouring to draw out the kindest and wisest aspect of the assertions on either side; but as two of the working-men who had been most strongly engaged on the matter, said to me recently, "that was not what we wanted." Each of the two sides wanted a definite decision from their leader, which they could throw at the heads of the other side, or with which they could salve their own consciences. Now this was precisely the thing which he was thoroughly determined neither in this, nor in any other instance, to give. Looking upon it as his special function to awaken conscience, not to stifle it or to kill it by prescribing rules, he looked upon a cut-and-dried decision given ex-cathedrá by himself as an absolute wrong and mischief, no matter how good the decision might be, as interfering with the divine discipline and education which the King, whom it was his business to proclaim and that of conscience to acknowledge, was giving to each of His subjects. Nothing is more remarkable in the experiences of his life than the consistency with which he adhered to this principle, or the difficulty which others had in seeing at the moment the central motive which gave consistency to his action.

He told the walkers that if they would go for a walk between the services he would accompany them, and as they now say, when afterwards some of them took to walking according to their proposal, no blame came to them from his mouth. They probably did not understand how bitterly, for all that, he blamed himself, believing that if the message he had to deliver could come forth from him, men would come to hear it; and that it was all his fault that they should choose rather the fields than the church.

It seemed to those who saw this habit of rigid severity with himself, and the care which he took to keep secret as far as lay in his power any act that would draw the approbation and admiration of others, that palpably it met with its reward in the wonderful personal influence which he, quite unconsciously to himself, exercised upon almost every human being who so crossed his path in life as really to see anything of him. It was the case with servants, with little children, with country villagers, wherever he went. As a country parson, when he took duty during the vacation, he had none of the qualities of the busy, active, hail-fellow-well-met parish clergyman. He would look shyly in at a cottage with a "Beautiful day, my friend," to a washer-woman, busy among the suds, and be met by, "Aye, mighty fine if ye h'aint nothing to do." From which he would generally retire discomfited, with a sad sense of the tendency to feed on discontent he so met with. His intense dread of being the parson in a sense which cut him off from men, not in a sense which bound him to speak as man to men, often made him very diffident in formal clerical visits. It needed usually a little time for his influence to make itself felt, or sickness or trouble to make him wanted. Nothing is more striking than the way in which those who had him with them in sorrow, generally the people of all others to whom any kind of intrusion is most intolerable at the time, and painful to recall afterwards, now press on me their remembrance of the comfort that he was to them; far more, as they say, by his presence and the sense of his real sympathy than by any words he used.

In a measure too, he, as the author of the 'Ecce Homo' would say, carried in his hand, in this matter of recognition, "his winnowing fan." It was usually, altogether irrespective of opinions, those who were the best of their class that most quickly caught an enthusiasm for him. At one country-house at which he was staying the confidential upper servant was found by her mistress, the morning after he had arrived, brushing a pair of boots. Her mistress inquired in surprise what she was doing. "Oh, ma'am, I can't let any one else brush Mr. Maurice's boots whilst he's here. I never saw any one like him before, and I can't do anything else for him." A lady who had been among the earliest shareholders in the Record (in the days when some of the best of people really wished for an organ that should speak forth for truth, charity, and goodness, and never dreamed of the travestie of those sacred names which they were starting) heard my father once do what people call "read prayers." She had known him till then only in the pages of the Record. If the mere statements of simple fact to which that most religious organ had pledged itself, in every way that anonymous writers, assumed to be gentlemen, can pledge themselves, were true, it was not possible for her to think too badly of my father. That once hearing him pray settled the question in her mind. From that time forth the Record slandered in vain. Such incidents were not unfrequent. It was not uncommon for people who went occasionally to hear him when he was afterwards at Vere Street, to be rather pleased than not if he had undertaken the service instead of preaching. The effect of the prayers as he gave them forth was a thing recalled again and again by many who knew little else of him. Many have said that for the first time they understood the force of a prayer after hearing him. I shall have occasion to speak more fully hereafter of one unfortunate result which sometimes followed from this personal impression; but here, where I am recording its nature, it will be more easily realised how naturally confusion would be produced in a mind which felt this kind of hallowed charm about him and yet at the time knew him, not as he appears here in his own letters and acts, but as he appeared in the Record, or other similar organs. It had in some cases the fatal effect of attracting men to the opinions, views, thoughts, life which the Record had attributed to him; to opinions, views, life against which his whole life was a struggle. This happened so frequently, such constant evidence of it has come before me, that I cannot too often insist upon the fact of this terrible penalty which follows in the track of religious slander.

There were exceptions to the influence which he exercised; and many who never altogether lost a kindly feeling for him, altogether repudiated his lead after having worked with him for some time.

There were times when he could make his words sting like a lash and burn like a hot iron. The very nature of his appeal always to a man's own conscience, to his sense of right within the scope in which the man himself clearly discerned what was right and what was wrong, the full recognition of ability when he complained that it was being abused, the utter absence of any desire to dictate in details or to require any conformity to his own opinions—seemed as it were, when he spoke indignantly, to carry the man addressed, then and there, “unhousel'd, disappointed, unanel'd,” before the tribunal with which rests “the ultimate and highest decision upon men's deeds, to which all the unjustly condemned at human tribunals appeal, and which weighs not the deed only, but motives, temptations and ignorances, and all the complex conditions of the deed.” There were some to whom he so spoke, who never forgave him. The marvellous thing, considering the depth to which he sometimes cut, is that there were so few.

Whenever something that he looked upon as morally wrong or mean excited his wrath, he began in a most violent manner to rub together the palms of his two hands. The fits of doing so would often come on quite suddenly as a result of his reflections on some action, as frequently as not of the religious world, or of so-called religious people. He appeared at such moments to be entirely absorbed in his own reflections, and utterly unconscious of the terrible effect which the fierce look of his face and the wild rubbing of his hands produced upon an innocent bystander. A lady who often saw him thus, says that she always expected sparks to fly from his hands, and to see him bodily on fire. Certainly the effect was very tremendous and by no means pleasant.

In the evenings at home, when he was not either at the Working Men's College, or on one of his other numerous employments, he usually read aloud whatever was the most generally interesting book of the time. He was fond of chess, and played a good, not a highly scientific, game. He seldom, however, found time for playing unless it was for the sake of giving pleasure to some one else.

The next letter to Mr. Kingsley refers to a pamphlet "On the Sabbath Day," which was the result of the dispute among the working-men on that subject.

' MY DEAR KINGSLEY, ' 5 Russell Square, July 29, 1856.

' I send you by this post a tract of mine, which you will entirely disapprove, and which, therefore, I wished that you should receive from me, and not at second hand. I did not write it to please myself; the working-men and many of my friends will suppose that I wrote it to please the religious world, which I hope will hate me more and more, and which I hope to hate more and more. But the conviction has been growing on me that the reformation which must deliver us from its yoke, and which is needed for the whole land, must be of a very deep and radical kind, and that it will not be effected through that kind of lore which is (as you have said, and as I freely confess) far purer and happier in itself than that which we have to seek, who delve in the dark flowerless caverns and coal mines of our own souls. 'As my sole vocation is metaphysical and theological grubbing, as the treasures of earth and sky and air are not for me, I feel that the friends on whom they are bestowed, and who understand that they are richly to enjoy, will become less and less able to tolerate me. Nevertheless, one's work must be done whatever it is, in the dark or in the sunshine does not much signify. I hope I am not envious—God knows how inclined I am often to be so—of those who can rejoice in nature and art and science. I do not, in any right mood, impute my incapacity to God, but to my own sin, and wish to confess it, and to ask that those who have the use of their senses may use them rightly and for the noblest ends.'*

To Mrs. Colenso.

'Kircullen, Moycullen, Galway, Ireland, August 19, 1856.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

'I wish I could make you understand how often I have determined to answer your interesting and welcome letters, and how often I have been deterred, not wholly by indolence but by the thought that I could not write you some cold, hard, London letter, but must wait till some words were put into me which might cheer you in your distant work. I am sure that such words would be given to us continually, and in abundance, if we were more willing and earnest to receive them; but there is a weight upon one's own spirits, and upon the spirit of the whole Church, which seems to stifle one's utterances and often to make the heart within very frozen. Perhaps it may do you good even to tell you that, because it will prove to you that there is good—an almost infinite good—in what must often be overwhelming, and seem dreary labour; in that it leads you to trust less in outward circumstances and advantages, and throws you more upon the absolute love of God. And there is also the very great comfort, which I am sure you may feel, that you are doing a work for England as well as Natal, and that you will be some day sending us missionaries to tell us truths that we have well-nigh forgotten. Do tell the bishop, with my kindest love, that the battle he is fighting is ours also; nothing less than the battle whether the devil or the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is the God. Everything is coming in England and perhaps quicker still in this country, in which we are staying for a few weeks, to that issue. Romanists and Protestants will have to ask themselves, not whether they believe in a pope or no pope, but whether they believe in a God of Truth or a God of Lies. Each must be tried by the answer; and each must have his own tree cut down, because it cumbers the ground, if it is not found to have the good root and not the accursed one.

* The answer to this letter is on p. 96, Vol. II., of Mr. Kingsley's Life, smaller edition.

‘I am running on at a great rate, having once started, and am telling you the things that are pressing on my mind instead of talking of the thousand more interesting and more hopeful topics that are occupying you; not because they do not interest me deeply, but because I am certain that there is this common interest which binds Europe and Africa together, and which we must strive always to keep in mind. But all you are doing for the Caffre children and for the Zulus’ and for your own, is really fulfilling, in the best and simplest way, that duty which comes upon us with so many complications—the deliverance from the yoke of a tyrant, by telling them of their true King. It seems to me as if all civilization and all Christianity had that same foundation, as if devil worship was the common enemy which both in their different ways have to struggle with. The earlier you can begin the strife the better, the more steadily you can keep it in sight to the end the better. Every day I have to reproach myself with being such a lazy, cowardly, despondent fighter, and to ask how it is that in the family, in the nation, in the Church, I am not always bearing witness to that which is true, against that which is debasing.

‘That the bishop is right in his view of polygamy, I can have little doubt. And if so, it must be a great and useful duty to state his conviction. It brings new thought and experience to bear on the great subject of family life; and the moral effect of every courageous and well-considered announcement of difficulty, and a purpose, can scarcely be estimated. I am sorry that he has had any purely ecclesiastical conflicts, though it cannot be hoped that any one should avoid them in our days; and though it is needful in all ways to assert the authority of a Church and the grounds of it, these questions have become so embarrassed in England with trivialities, that one trembles lest the real issue of the strife in which we are engaged should be hidden from the eyes of any by means of them. I feel more and more that everything is involved in our defending the principles which are asserted in the Catechism, but that they are, if they could be fairly presented, so grand and comprehensive that we should strain every nerve, and ask all help, that they may not be mixed with anything which contracts or enfeebles them. What I say, however, applies chiefly to what is passing every day among ourselves; I am quite incompetent to pronounce about your difficulties, which I am sure the bishop will have grace to meet in a wise way.

* * * * *

‘Ever your very affectionate friend.’

‘Kircullen, Moycullen, Galway, Ireland, September 8, 1856.

‘MY DEAR MR. CAMPBELL,

I do not feel sure that I ever sent to you a letter which I wrote many months ago. I think that for some reason or other I laid it aside; if so, you cannot have known, except at second hand, how greatly I prized your kindness in sending me your book, or what interest I have taken in the book itself.

I was especially delighted with the manner in which you addressed yourself to what you know to be the feelings of the people of Scotland, how earnestly you sympathised with them, how gently and honestly and affectionately you dealt with the books which you felt to be wrong.

‘I entirely agree with your preference of the strong statements of Edwards to the more diluted Calvinism of later days. If you had gone back to Knox, as I almost wish you had done, I think your expressions of inward fellowship would have been even more cordial; at least, when I read what would be called a very vehement treatise of his on predestination, I felt as if my heart responded to the spirit of it, and often to the letter of it; that I went along with him in all his positive statements, and only was at issue with him when he made those statements less full and deep than they might have been, lest he should yield a point to the Arminians. No one could speak more earnestly and passionately than he does of God’s righteousness in contradistinction to His sovereignty. It seemed to me that if you could have seen him, as no doubt you will some day, he must have understood you.

‘I think I entirely accept your idea of the atonement so far as it bears on the relations of God with each individual soul. Perhaps I hold more strongly than you do a reconciliation of the whole of humanity with God in Christ, which would enable me to use some of the expressions which you would reject; though I should be very careful of using them, lest I should convey a dishonest impression, and be suspected of differing with your great axiom. . . . I feel as if this were rather presumptuous language. In all spiritual truth I feel that you are so much the teacher, and I the learner, that I am afraid of putting myself in a wrong position. But I know you will understand me and will believe what hearty joy it gave me to meet with such full and free statements of God’s love to men, as you poured forth from the depth of your own experience.

‘May I ask you to remember me very kindly to Mrs. Campbell.

‘Ever very affectionately yours,’

Welshampton Parsonage, Ellesmere, September 20, 1856.

‘MY DEAR MR. SOLLY,

‘I have just received your two kind letters, for which I beg you to accept my best thanks. I had thoughts of writing to you when I had that dispute with the Inquirer; partly because you had spoken to me of a connection which you supposed me to have with the Saturday Review, and I wished to assure you that I have never written a line in it, that I do not know the editor, that I have very seldom seen it, and that I have no expectation of being understood by that or any journal whatsoever. I have grown more and more to desire the friendship of all schools and sects, and more and more to feel myself in deadly and hopeless hostility with the anonymous newspapers which represent them. I did not want your assurance that my good and valued friend Mr. Hutton was not the editor of the Inquirer. He himself wrote to me in the kindest manner three years ago to acknowledge the authorship of the article in the Prospective Review and of some that he had written about me in the Inquirer at that time. To me it is the pleasantest thing possible to have intercourse with men. But for shadows I have no respect at all. I am ashamed of myself when I meddle with them. I certainly should not have troubled the Inquirer if he had spoken any bitter words of me; I am pretty well used to them. But he flattered me and at the same time said that I was in the habit of committing what I regard as the most horrible crime that a man can commit, viz., that I played with words as with counters. He says I want to teach him and Unitarians theology. No such thing. I want to teach him the A B C of morality. He has no business to praise a man whom he describes as an habitual cheat. That is most immoral. I do not say behind his back in a mask what I would not say to his face, if I knew that he had one. You are quite welcome to show him what I have written.

‘I suppose it is very difficult to make any one understand any other’s position. I do not think we ought to take much pains for that purpose, but to leave God to justify our cause if it is a right one, and to pray Him to show us if it is wrong. What the Inquirer said about his desire to form a church, however, did very much to strengthen my conviction that I should be committing a sin by deserting the place which I occupy. I think the Church of England is the witness in our land against the sect principle of "forming churches" which is destroying us and the Americans too (see on the latter point Mrs. Stowe's testimony in 'Dred'). As long as we think we can form churches we cannot be witnesses for a Humanity and for a Son of man. We cannot believe that we do not choose Him, but that He chooses us and sends us to bear witness of His Father and of Him. Everything seems to me involved in this difference. I admit that the English Church is in a very corrupt, very evil condition. I am not afraid to own that, because I believe it is a Church and not a sect. The sect feeling, the sect habit is undermining it. The business of us who belong to it is to repent of our sectarianism and to call our brothers to repent, to show that we have a ground on which all may stand with us. If we do that business well we shall have as many kicks, I fancy, as we shall get anywhere, kicks from all sides. Of all temptations, that of putting oneself at the head of anything, that of getting up a mere sect which must be worse and more devilish than the old—and that is saying a good deal—is the one which I would strive against most. I know only God can enable me wholly to overcome it.

'I have to thank you very much for the pleasure and instruction your poem has given me.'

'MY DEAR TRENCH,

'Prees, October 10, 1856.

'I have just heard from Plumptre that I may really praise God that He has put into the hearts of our rulers to choose well for Westminster. I do not know what may be intended for you hereafter, but I am sure that work which will be good for you and for the whole Church will be found for you in the Deanery. We to whom London is and ought to be dearer than the rest of the land, though for the sake of the rest, cannot but rejoice apart from all private reasons that you should be there rather than elsewhere, and, for the present, in a position which will not interfere with your writing on theology or any other subject.'

On October 25, 1856, he answers a letter in which Dean Trench, then recently appointed to Westminster, writes to tell him that the member of the Council of Queen's College who had opposed his re-election (see p. 215) as professor at Queen's College, had either withdrawn all opposition or left the Council, and that that body now unanimously wished for his return. He therefore from the beginning of the next term resumed his lectures on moral philosophy and English literature.

In November 1856 a number of those who occasionally attended Lincoln's Inn expressed a wish to have an opportunity of reading regularly the sermons he preached. Mr. Ludlow, who had been the prime mover in the matter, undertook all the trouble connected with it, arranged for the sermons to be printed by subscription, for their distribution, and carried out all the necessary correspondence. The arrangement continued for three years.

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'February 5, 1857.

'I was grieved to miss you yesterday, and was almost as much grieved to see your card, because I fear you put yourself out, when you were hard pushed and not well, to come here, in consequence of some notion that I should take it amiss if you did not. Now, if you knew how many outrages I commit upon the laws of propriety and upon the law of kindness too, you would not suppose that I could throw stones at any one for such trifles as these. I am sometimes cross enough, revenging my own evil doings upon those about me; but in my sober senses I am thoroughly convinced that every one shows me just a thousand times as much kindness as I deserve or as I ever exhibit to them. Thank you for all your good and encouraging words about my two books.

What you said about the Philosophy helped me to bear the hardest thing which was ever said of me, by a writer in the Westminster—that I had written as fast as my pen would go about men whom I had taken no pains to get acquainted with. I did give three years,* and did take honest pains to learn what they were like. If you knew what a thin-skinned animal I am, and how these things make me smart, you would understand better how much I value your soothing plaisters, which I hope one is not too ready to apply; for I suppose the irritation is useful also.

‘I cared still more for your judgment of the St. John†; there are many things in that book which I should wish to understand better myself, and which I wish all I care for to understand. But, after all, I trust I care a good deal more that the thing should be understood than that I should be. The longing for personal sympathy has something right in it, but I suppose it is akin to disease, and whenever I am able to reflect wisely and earnestly, I desire that those who have ever got any good out of me should grow much too old and wise for my teaching, and should not feel themselves cramped and chained by it. I had some terrible experiences many years ago from not learning that lesson, and wishing (secretly) that a dear friend who once regarded me as a sort of guide should go on doing so when he was fitter to guide me. Ever since his death I have mourned over that vanity, and desired that I should never fall into it again.’

Perhaps it will be as well to say here that, whatever may be the value of the history of ‘Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy,’ at least, as a matter of fact, there is not a line of it that was not the product of enormous thought and labour. He was living, during most of the time that he was writing it, close to the British Museum, and he constantly and freely worked in the library there. From the Bodleian Library, which is especially generous as a lending library, he always took down into the country the volumes that were necessary for the part of the work he was engaged upon. Not many men worked within the twenty-four hours for a longer period than he usually did. He was engaged upon the book for the greater part of his life. Most of the other literary and professorial works of his life tended to aid this one. He had among his personal friends or acquaintances most of those from whom on all subjects of the kind most men would be glad to receive suggestions, and when any point required the suggestion of others he freely consulted them. From the time that he went into Hare's class-room an unknown undergraduate, to the time of his appointment to the Knightsbridge professorship in Cambridge, his metaphysical power and his rapid grasp of a subject were the special admiration of those from whom the world has since then learnt to judge of men and books. The whole bent and tendency of his mind, as he says himself, from a child was dramatic, that is, he was always anxious to assert for each man his own position, not anxious to merge it in some other. This, by the witness of all those who worked with him, was his characteristic at all times. Those who have used the 'Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy' with classes for teaching, speak of this as the characteristic also of this book. They tell me that they find the interest of their classes greatly increased because of the human reality and the individual life which pervades it throughout; because it is a story of the lives of men who lived and thought and blundered and struggled, of men of more than ordinary mental power and more than ordinary character, who have much helped to shape the life and thought of the world. It is not I who say this. It is pressed on me, not by my father's immediate friends, but by others who only knew him at a distance. But unfortunately those who know most of these subjects are for the most part shy of criticising a book which covers such an enormous field of thought. Those who are never shy of talking have spoken freely enough about it. Not even professing to have studied it, or checked it by independent study, not professing to say of it that in any matter in which they do know they find it careless or inaccurate, but deciding à priori that a book implying so much work must have been done hastily; quoting as quite decisive of a book that represents decades of the labour of a man they profess to reverence, the obiter dicta of those who have "glanced" at it, and have therefore shown their own peculiar quality as historians by deciding off-hand that the book must possess characteristics which are exactly the reverse of those of the author in every other walk of life. Such weighty utterances have their currency; how long they live except as warnings for the future may possibly be another question. Time will determine.

* I.e. to this one section of the ‘Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy,’ “The Middle Ages.”

† His book on the Gospel of St. John, which had just been published.

The Working-Men's College was making, on the whole, steady progress, but all kinds of difficult questions had arisen and had needed no small amount of tact and judgment for their solution. The very nature of the undertaking precluded any kind of religious test. Had there been no other motive, all test as to the religious views of teachers or students would have been forbidden by the central principle on which my father's faith was based—that Christ was the head of every man, not only of those who believed in Him—and by his special desire to bridge the gulph between the working-men and the "clerisy," as, following Coleridge, he habitually called the body of university men, artists, scientific men, and others who are capable of teaching. Nevertheless, at a very early stage in the history of the college, he had carefully avoided an express declaration that its founders were indifferent to the religious position of those who came to them, a declaration urged upon them by one of those who had been working with them from the first. The Talandier incident had also, to a certain extent, cleared the air in that respect. Much of the most valuable assistance that was given to the teaching of the college was given by men who could have accepted no common religious formula, and many of whom would have accepted none at all. Very much of the practical success of the experiment depended on the fact that a large body of the workers forming a nucleus within it, consisted of those men who had been long gathered round my father, the great majority of whom looked up to him with the greatest confidence as a spiritual guide. But they had welcomed all help that had been offered, considering that the sacrifice of time and labour without payment in behalf of an entirely unselfish object was, better than any form of words, a guarantee of the spirit that would make common work possible.

The teaching had been of a kind that many an older well-endowed educational body would have been lucky to secure. Messrs. Ruskin, Alexander Munro, Woolner, Lowes Dickinson, and D. G. Rossetti, had given up evening after evening to teaching art to the students.

Not to mention the lawyer-friends, whose names recur so frequently, English literature and history and other subjects had been taught by Messrs. Fitz-James Stephen, Godfrey and Vernon Lushington, Westlake, J. S. Brewer, Frederic Harrison, W. J. Brodribb, M. E. Grant-Duff, C. H. Dasent, and C. H. Pearson.

The more general subjects of university education, Latin, Greek, logic, general history, had been taught by some ten clergymen, by almost as many men subsequently best known as members of Parliament, by university men of almost every profession. But, on the whole, the most promising fact connected with it had been one which has, with some occasional interruptions, continued up to the present time. A continual fresh stream of young men from the universities had gradually succeeded to those who were from various reasons no longer able to take part in the work of the college. The art teachers mentioned above were succeeded at later dates by Messrs. Burne Jones, Valentine Prinsep, Cave Thomas, Arthur Hughes, Madox Brown, and Stacey Marks, all of whom gave in different degrees help in the studios. Teaching in science had been given at first by Messrs. Maskelyne and R. Bowell, and later by Messrs. Huxley, Spottiswoode, and Flower, some of whom only gave single lectures, but others took classes.

Mr. Litchfield became in a few years the most active and devoted of the members of the council in all the practical work of the college, and in the editing of the college magazine, which was a feature of importance as long as the provincial colleges remained in existence, in supplying a means of mutual intercourse. My father was very fond of using the illustration of a London hospital and the unpaid work given to it by medical men, as a proof that there was real advantage gained by the teachers in the time they gave, as well as by the working-men. But despite the, in many respects, remarkable success which had attended and continued to attend the college, the daily routine and many circumstances connected with it often caused my father great distress and continually led to states of depression, in which he attributed, as his manner was, everything that was defective to himself and his own mistakes. It is manifest that, from the nature of the body carrying out the undertaking, the smoothness with which the work was likely to proceed depended on the discretion with which all those who were engaged in it avoided forcing inconvenient questions into prominence, and that such discretion could scarcely be universal and unbroken. The following four letters will, perhaps, be sufficient specimens of the kind of difficulties that occurred from time to time, and of his mode of meeting them.

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

‘March 20, 1857.

‘I blame myself very much for my want of presence of mind in not saying something to take off the edge of the unkind omission of any allusion to Dickinson and Woolner in Z.’s otherwise very able speech last night. It was not that I did not feel it, perhaps more than either of them, or that I did not think seriously whether I could not throw in some special commendation of them, or rather some expression of my own strong feeling of the honour of being connected with them, and of my sense of the good they are doing us. But nothing occurred to me which would not have made the matter worse, so I held my tongue. I thought, when it was too late, of a way, as one generally does. Do you think Dickinson would at all care to have any of my books from me? I am always ashamed of the self-conceit of sending them to any one. But if it would be a pleasure to him I will swallow down that feeling and write him a note with them. I would do the like to Woolner; he has most kindly given me his medallion of Tennyson. I could say truly to both of them that the bust of Tennyson, and Dickinson's picture [of Charles Mansfield] at your house, help me more in the literature and politics of the nineteenth century than any books.'

A legal sub-committee of the college council had about this time recommended as a matter of practical convenience in point of form that the college should be constituted as a joint stock company. Many of those who had been working with them heartily up to this point disapproved of this arrangement, and threatened to have no more to do with the college under these circumstances. The deed had been drawn, so that to change what had been done involved expense.

Mr. Ludlow had recently sent to my father the balance from the subscriptions of the first half year of the sermons, which had now for six months been printed by subscription. This sum is the "donation" referred to in the next letter, the second, which I give as a specimen of the college events, and his relation to them. The third, which relates to the same matter, may follow it without explanation. The fourth is on quite another subject, but does not need comment.

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

' May 22, 1857.

'I cannot tell you how much your donation yesterday surprised me, or how little right I felt that I had to it. Nevertheless I shall not refuse it, because there is a way of making use of it which I trust you will approve, which I believe you will approve all the more because it will involve a sacrifice on your part, as well as on mine, of an opinion which we agreed in, and for which I am at least as responsible as you. I see that this business of the company is producing an effect on some of our fellow-labourers which will not be stopped by any arguments. I fear that the devices by which we might hope to make peace will involve us in difficulties, and will put us in a wrong position with the public. However great the advantage might have been if we could have done the thing quietly, now that it has been talked about, and objections raised, it must be hurtful, and perhaps it might damage us with the London University, where there is only too much prejudice against us already. It seems to me therefore that the shortest and best method is to cut the knot instead of seeking to untie it. The expenses of altering the deed besides the £5 for enrolling, must I know exceed what I can give; but this contribution of yours (not mine) will go some way. Therefore let us take that course. I think other arrangements for making the government of the college more efficient may be grafted upon it, and that good, instead of evil, may come out of this little stir.'

'5 Russell Square, May 30, 1857.

'I think you are not just to the dissidents. A priori, it is inexpedient that a college should be a company. You think that there is a possibility under a certain Act of a college becoming a company without placing itself in a position which would be inconsistent with its proper work, and which would involve its members in a trading speculation. They doubt whether there is this possibility. They say we have decided this question hastily and without their knowledge, and that if we think this step so slight a one, which seems to them a very serious one, we may take other steps which would bring them, and the whole college, into a false position. It will not do to meet their objections by accusing them of shrinking from a fair share of moral or pecuniary responsibility. We must not bring such charges. There will be no working together if we do. We ought to be ready to give up our own notions for the sake of a greater end, even if they are ever so reasonable. I am therefore quite unshaken in my first opinion, and wish earnestly to break up the company in the way I proposed.'

Ultimately a scheme was devised for establishing a company in connection with and subordinate to the college. In this form the work was carried on for many years, till the college became independent of the company. The secession of several members took place nevertheless.

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,'

'July 8, 1857.

'What you say of our prayers at the college and of our general failure to give it a heart is painfully true. The prayers I read with real suffering whenever I lecture. Two or three listen, probably with reluctance. The teachers and students generally are out in the garden or talking in the library. I have no hold upon either. Still I think it is better not to give them up. As to renewing the Bible-class, nothing would be more satisfactory to me, if it is possible. My Bible-classes give me more pleasure than any other work I engage in, and I learn more from them. But they have lost their interest for all or almost all the teachers and most of the students. "Give an account of thy stewardship, for thou mayst be no longer steward," is often sounding in my ears; I wish the sound led to more digging or begging. I believe I have more to accuse myself of than them. However, if there is any way of reformation, I hope it will be shown us during the vacation and that we may be able to enter into it.'

CHAPTER IX.

"Ich bin ein ich." "I am an I."—Jean Paul.

END OF 1857.—LECTURES ON THE EPISTLES OF ST. JOHN—LETTER TO MR. LANGLEY GIVING AN ACCOUNT OF THESE AND OF A LONG CORRESPONDENCE WITH MR. MANSEL—INDIAN MUTINIES—DIFFICULTIES AS TO SUNDAY AT WORKING-MEN'S COLLEGE—ANONYMOUS WRITING AND SIGNED ARTICLES—"I."

My father had been delivering a course of lectures at eight o'clock on Sunday mornings to a class at the Working-Men's College, on the Epistles of St. John. They are in fact his clearest and simplest setting forth of thought on the subject of morals. They are full of the question which was already occupying his mind as to the nature of the knowledge of God which is possible to man. The next letter will explain how his attention had just at this time been forcibly drawn to the matter. The letter in fact records the preliminary skirmish of the greatest contest of his life. Not a few of his readers prefer the statement of his views contained in the 'Lectures' to the more elaborate one to be referred to in the next chapter.

Somerville Cottage, Tunbridge Wells,

'MY DEAR LANGLEY,

'September 18, 1857.

- 'I am delighted to see that you have made such progress towards the establishment of a college. Wolverhampton is quite the place for it, and you have begun rightly by treating all patronage with indifference. Let it come if it will come, but do not go a step out of your way to seek for it.
- 'I am just about to publish a set of lectures on Christian Ethics delivered at our Working College on Sunday mornings. It is somewhat bold to start with such a subject, especially as the manual on which I lecture is the Epistles of St. John. But I think it is safer to declare what we mean in that way. I make none of my colleagues responsible for my sentiments. None of the pupils, of course, are compelled to listen to them. And by putting this forth I explain what I think is the true foundation of social and of individual life. These lectures will put me in more direct antagonism with Mr. Mansel and his school than anything I have published yet; seeing that I maintain on St. John's authority—taking his words to mean what they say—not only that the knowledge of God is possible for men, but that it is the foundation of all knowledge of men and of things; that science is impossible altogether if He is excluded from the sphere of it.

‘To meet the positivism of Comte in any other way than this seems to me idle and vain.

‘Atheism is the only alternative for an age which demands science, if we cannot “know that we know” God, and if to know Him is not eternal life.

‘I am sorry if I have done anything which seemed rude to Mr. Mansel. Nothing was further from my intention. At a time when people were attacking me on other grounds, he wrote a quiet and gentlemanlike pamphlet exposing my ignorance of all true philosophy. I wrote at once to thank him for the tone of his letter, and (because it was so important) deferred an answer to it till I had time to exhibit my belief on this subject in connection with the rest of my teaching. I took advantage of the republication of my Old Testament sermons a year and a half after, to reply gravely and respectfully to a pamphlet which I might have assumed that my readers did not remember if they had heard of it. I sent my book to Mr. Mansel, of course, and received from him in due time an elaborate reply. I judged from the allusions in it to his University occupations and to the hopelessness of our ever understanding each other, that he wished me not to trouble him any more; each of us had said his say; an accomplished Oxford logician of high reputation had surely done as much as could be expected from him (more than I expected) in stooping to notice a half fanatical mystic such as he takes me to be. Was I to persevere after his kindness and toleration, by inflicting on him several pages of illegible MS.? You are quite welcome to show this defence to Mr. Campbell, and he can show it to any Oxford friend of his who has accused me of being disrespectful to so eminent a man as Mr. Mansel. I am not so used to recognition, of one sort or another, from men like him, that I could afford to trifle with any instance of it.

'I am sorry to have spent so much time in talking of myself; but the subject of my difference with those who think that revelation does not reveal is now the uppermost in my mind.

'I think I have a sermon by me on the text of which you speak.* I will look it over if I can find it, and will revise it if it is worth anything, or write another, as you wish, if it is not. I have no wish to evade the force of the words. Must not we teach young men that the choice of Hercules was the true one; that the hard life is better than the easy one? Must we not tell them that the path of self-indulgence, self-seeking, self-glorification, under irreligious or religious pretences, is a broad one leading to death; and that the confession, "In me dwelleth no good thing; Christ's life, which is for all, is the only life for me; in Him only I can be righteous and true," is one to which our nature is little disposed, and which all the habits of the religious, fashionable, intellectual worlds dispose us to contradict? Is it not a straight and narrow path to life?'

The news of the Indian mutinies was now daily reaching England. He was at the time staying at Tunbridge Wells in consequence of a serious illness of his wife's.

* "Straight is the gate, and narrow is the way. . . and few there be that find it."

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

‘Somerville Cottage, Tunbridge Wells, September 21, 1857.

‘. . . The Indian news brings back all the questions to this age which the Lisbon earthquake forced upon the last. We shall have our letters on optimism and also our Candides. And if we do not take the Cross as the solution of the world’s puzzles, I think the Voltaire doctrine will triumph over the Rousseau. But in the meantime I do feel that these unspeakable horrors are more a message to Englishmen than even to Anglo-Indians. We, who send out our young men and young women, have immeasurably more to answer for than they have for any failures they may commit. They are suffering for us. I cannot see my way an inch about caste, and the other questions which your knowledge enables you to speak of. But I see that our morality and our Christianity are of a very low order; that we cannot impart more than we have; that we have imparted just what we have and what we were—some sense of law, justice, truth, with a considerable amount of atheism. It is clear that we have converted the people to that, and the atheistical period being impregnated with all the elements of the devil worship which it has supplanted, is, as the first French Revolution proved, the time for ferocities; though these ferocities belong, I suppose, only to Asiatics. The call to us is very loud. I have been asking myself in hours of solitude what it is. I am sure the priests of the land, the educated classes of the land, fathers and mothers of families, teachers, can do much more (and are therefore more guilty than all Downing Street and Leadenhall Street) to reform India by reforming England. I think there should be no accusations except of ourselves; and that these should appear chiefly in acts meet for repentance. I have thought that perhaps the Bible readings, of which you spoke before I left town, might in some way be connected with our Lincoln’s Inn Communion, all who had partaken with us at our annual gathering * or any other time, being invited to attend them, expressly that we might consider what obligations this service has laid upon us. But my thoughts are not mature; only I feel we must begin a new life in the college and altogether. I hope my ethical lectures, which are nearly ready, may at least express my thoughts of the groundwork of a college. I should like to be in the neighbourhood you describe, though this is very beautiful. Lord Goderich is here; very earnest, and, so far as I can judge, desirous to learn what is right about India. Kind regards to Mrs. Ludlow.'

* The friends of Charles Mansfield on the anniversary of his death met each year at Lincoln’s Inn and received the Communion.

To Mr. Ludlow (on the Prayers for the Day of Humiliation for the Indian Mutinies).

'10 Grand Parade, St. Leonard's-on-Sea, October 6, 1857.

'I propose going up to London to-morrow to read those cold and formal prayers which the Archbishop has composed for a day of burning sorrow and humiliation. They will stick in my throat; but I shall ask to be able to speak words which are not in harmony with them.'

'10 Grand Parade, St. Leonard's-on-Sea, October 14, 1857.

'I thought over what you said, and read my sermon with severity. But I could not make up my mind to leave out the passage on the Archbishop's prayers. I did not write it down without much consideration and many alterations. I was thoroughly convinced that something ought to be said on the subject from the pulpit, because the murmurs deep and even loud which I heard from all quarters, wanted some expression, and that is the safest.'

To his Wife (after a visit to Winchester, of which Dr. Moberly was at the time Head-Master, and where one of his sons was at school).

'October 27, 1857.

' . . . I found Dr. Moberly as kind and judicious in his conversation as he was in his letter.

' . . . I was delighted with Dr. Moberly. His countenance really glowed with pleasure at the sight of Edmund's face when he first recognised me. "That is a joy," he said, when the boy had gone out, "which we never have in later life; there is nothing like it." I have a strong conviction that he has the intuition respecting the character of those who are under him, which God gives to the humble and faithful who are aware of their responsibility. Edmund was much touched and surprised when I told him of the knowledge Dr. Moberly had of him, and compared it with what is said in 'Tom Brown' of Dr. Arnold.

'The bells were ringing, as I came into Winchester, for the fall of Delhi; but they sounded sad in my ears—so many killed. No news from Lucknow.'

In February, 1858, the preachership of Lincoln's Inn fell vacant, and my father's friends were again anxious to persuade him to stand for it. He again declined to allow his name to be submitted. He put forward reasons very similar to those which he had alleged to Hare in the letters on p. 356, Vol. I., in 1843, and on p. 410, Vol. I., in 1845. In fact his belief that he could best perform the work he had to do in the world by avoiding all high preferment, was the determining motive. He used as in the correspondence with Hare (Vol. I., pp. 356, etc.) whatever excuses would best enable him to avoid assuming an air of self-sacrifice. Dr. Thomson was appointed preacher.

In the beginning of May, 1858, my father broke down in health and was ordered to Eastbourne. The letter to Miss Williams Wynn which follows is in answer to the letter given on p. 246 of Miss W. Wynn's 'Memorials.' Miss Wynn's answer to it is given on p. 245 of that book.

Miss Wynn's two letters may almost be said to be parts of my father's biography. The earlier tells of the effect of his personal presence upon one in deep trouble, and represents the response which he almost always, from those so suffering, evoked. The later letter (on p. 245) shows the effect of such a letter as that, which I am about to give, upon the highly cultivated mind to which it was addressed.

To Miss Williams Wynn.

‘Eastbourne, May 11, 1858.

‘I have given you poor proof how much your very kind letter cheered and refreshed me. No news could have been so gratifying to me as your assurance that my words had been of some comfort to Y——. I think it must have been what I did not say that was the true comfort. She has evidently heard too many words, and thought too many thoughts. To find that it is not wrong to be still and to let God speak, without mixing much of our speech, is indeed a great thing for her and for us all. I have been trying to spell out the lesson for myself during the last three weeks, and have broken down often in it, and made terrible blunders. What you say about our religious teaching and the change that must take place in it, as well as about the restless intellectual cravings of such men as Dr. Z——, has been occupying me much. I think we clergy are bitterly estranged from all classes of our people, high and low, wise and unwise. I think we have ourselves to blame for this estrangement. But I do not believe it would be removed or materially lessened if we were able to talk ever so glibly in a philosophical dialect, and to translate the New Testament into phrases about the subject-object. It seems to me that the heart and flesh of the intellectual man, as much as of the clodhoppers, are crying out for the living God; and that it is just this cry we have not understood, and have been unable to answer. The God we have preached has not been the God who was manifested in His Son Jesus Christ; but another altogether different Being in whom we mingle strangely the Siva and the Vishnu—the first being the ground of the character, the other its ornamental and graceful vesture. It is fearful to say so; if I spoke of what good people actually and in their heart of hearts believe, I should use no such language, but the very opposite. When I am describing what we have made of the Gospel of God’s redemption of the world, I cannot soften my expression; I do therefore anticipate a very deep and searching reformation, one which cannot be attended with less trials, one which I trust is to issue in greater blessings than the Reformation of the sixteenth century. How or when it is to begin, what Tetzels is to evoke what Luther, I know not, I dare not conjecture. I feel very strongly that the ascension of our Lord into the heavens, and the glorification of our nature in Him with the corresponding truth that the Church exists to witness of Him, not only as her Head, but as the Head of every man, will be the battle-cry that will rally Protestants and Romanists, hungry seekers after wisdom, lonely tatterdemalions without bread, about the one standard; and that opposition to this proclamation, a resolute clinging to the Fall as determining man's condition, a practical acknowledging of the Devil as the arbiter of it, will be the characteristic of the opposing host, gathered also from all sects, schools, churches.

‘It is easy to talk of such things; what I want is to prepare myself, and, so far as in me lies, all whom I know, for their actual coming. We shall all have to take our places in the conflict, all will have some service to perform. I tremble at my own indifference.

‘I have run on with what I fear you will think wild and strange thoughts. My doctor told me I was to keep my mind at rest. I can only say that if a clergyman's mind in these times is to have the kind of rest he supposes, the Devil must consent to let him alone, which I do not fancy he will to please any physician. But it is also true that God will not let him alone, and he may find the true rest in Him.’

To Mr. J. N. Langley.

‘6 Sea Side Road, Eastbourne, May 11, 1858.

‘Any Arminian protest against modern Calvinism must fail anywhere, but especially in Scotland. The Scotch are too logical, yes, and with all their faults, too godly for that poor feeble mixture. The strength of Calvinism lay of old in the ✓ proclamation of God as the originator of all faith and righteousness in man. The reformation of Calvinism must come from the steadfast grasp of that truth. Resolve not to let it go or dilute it with any philosophical explanations or theories, and you must come to a gospel that God is seeking after men to bring them back to His fold, that He has redeemed the race, that there is no good of any kind in any creature which must not be referred to Him, which it is not a sin to claim for the creature, under any miserable subterfuges, such as that "this only means the natural conscience" or "only means some beautiful relic of the fall"—as if these phrases meant anything at all! I believe fully that Scotch godliness and Scotch logic may both conspire to these results. And then the idea of the Episcopal constitution of the Church as a fatherly constitution, as a universal constitution, will come all in good time. If it comes too soon before the other belief, it will be an unhealthy exotic which must be kept alive by hot airs and regulated houses; if it follows that free and manly development of the old Calvinism, it may strike its roots into the national soil and bear worthy fruits hereafter.'

The Sunday question at the Working Men's College was still causing him trouble. He had written a letter to the students explaining his views. As usual, he was afraid of giving a clear-cut decision lest he should merely impose his own opinions; yet he reproached himself bitterly with any evil that resulted from his self-restraint. Other difficulties, the nature of which will be sufficiently indicated by parts of the following letter, had arisen. Mr. Ludlow, always anxious that he should assert himself and assume more authority, had been pressing him to take decided action. As usual, the one decided action that he was ready to take was to give up that which was dearest to himself—his own part of the work. He had at the time of writing left London for the summer.

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

‘Augusta Villas, Southborough, Tunbridge Wells,

‘August 9, 1858.

‘I have thought much of your faithful reproofs. I believe them to be wise as well as faithful. And now, if ever, is the time for acting on them, if only I can see how to do it rightly and not so as to produce a direct schism in the College. In the last number of the People, the organ I presume of the Sunday League, is a report of the students’ tea-meetings. It is written in a very vulgar tone. It concludes with an account of the Sunday geological expeditions, and a direct intimation that the students, as such, are joining the Sunday League. The passage alluding to my letter is so contemptuous, and as an account of the letter so unfair, that I am afraid of seeming to be actuated by some personal motive if I notice the report in a letter to the Editor of the People. But I must take some method of declaring that I disapprove of the tone of the whole document, and that I am no party to these expeditions—or resign. It reads to me like a declaration of war; I accept it, so far as I am myself concerned, as a righteous punishment for the unmanliness and want of purpose with which you justly reproach me. But I feel that without reference to the past something must be done for the future, unless our College is to be an example to all that are established elsewhere, of what they should not be. Let me say one word in explanation—not in defence—of my conduct hitherto, because it will make you understand better my present difficulties. I have felt that a Working College, if it is to do anything, must be in direct hostility to the Secularists—that is to say, must assert that as its foundation principle which they are denying. But to do this effectually it must also be in direct hostility to the Religionists—that is to say, it must assert the principle that God is to be sought and honoured in every pursuit, not merely in something technically called religion. To my own mind the position is a clear and firm one. But how to express it so that others should perceive it in our acts as well as our words—how to hinder all our students from thinking that geology means theology, if we say that the earth is God's—is a difficult and a harder work. I only wish you to appreciate the difficulty—not that it should be an excuse for leaving this thing undone. I have failed grievously, perhaps utterly, to make my meaning understood. I do not suppose I ever shall make it understood. But if it is what God means, He will make it manifest some day. As for being misrepresented or scorned by Secularists and Religionists, one ought to think nothing of it; but to welcome it and even desire it. But the thought of leaving confusion worse confounded in the minds of those whom we undertake to illuminate is very sad and overwhelming. I am afraid I have done this both for the students and most of the Council. You wish me to try and guide the latter. How few of them are there now—whatever may have been the case formerly, whatever might have been the case, if I had been honester and wiser—who would not kick at my guidance?

‘P.S.—I send the paper lest you should not have seen it.’

‘1 Augusta Villas, Southborough, August 17, 1858.

‘I have thought much of your reproofs and Hughes’ encouragements. I value them both exceedingly as proofs of friendship. I would fain persuade myself that what Hughes says is true, that some words of mine have done some people good some time or other. I will give God thanks for that. But this is no reason for continuing in a work which has ceased to be of benefit, in which I think I can henceforth only be mischievous. Whatever Q—— may pretend, the College is committed by his articles in the People. The tone of them commits us. He makes us all parties to that vulgar habit of thinking and speaking which he believes to be the best for the men, which I think is making them far less of gentlemen than they were before. He cannot be driven from the College. You say so yourself, and if he were, the impression of what he has done would be left, and would be stronger from their feeling of anger and pity for him. My resignation will have the opposite effect. That will be a witness that some of us have arrived at something else. That will be a just punishment on me for not having done anything to reach the men. It will be a lesson to other colleges. And you may then, with Hansard's help, restore it and them to a better footing. Therefore in deference to you and Hughes, I defer everything till October. I see no cause to change my resolution, but everything to confirm it. There is no other way out of the difficulty. The pain of it will be great to me, but that is salutary. I should accept, I think, the offer of almost any curacy in the country to be rid of London.'

His friends at length persuaded him to change his purpose of resigning.

He became, for the reasons which the following letters will set forth, intensely interested in a scheme for a magazine with Mr. Hughes as editor, in which the articles should all be signed.

The period is a somewhat noteworthy one in the history of English periodical literature. Dickens' quarrel with his publishers had led by a legal decision to the suppression of 'Household Words' and to the starting of 'All the Year Round' and of 'Once a Week.' Several publishers thought the moment a favourable one for new ventures; so that the great body of the modern magazines date from about the time of the incident in Dickens's life. My father was anxious that the opportunity should be seized to try the effect of signed articles as against anonymous writing. For the moment his proposal was rejected. That his conviction of the superior power of signed articles is in 1883 much less exceptional than it was in 1858 is perhaps not open to question.

To Rev. C. Kingsley.

'May 27, 1858.

'... About the general maxim that it is desirable, nay, absolutely necessary to begin, and to begin speedily, some journal which shall discard anonymous writing, I have no doubt whatever. Your argumentum ad verecundiam would do well enough if there was any verecundia in our existing journals. But you know in your conscience that there is none; you know that the We covers the most insolent pretension, the most offhand dogmatism, the most haughty scorn of individuals and of mankind. Look at the Saturday Review, the latest and most triumphant incarnation of the "We" spirit—and then talk of the time not being come in which men may venture to express themselves on great topics! It seems to me that if the time is come, as you tell us it is, in which nuisances that pollute the air are to be abated—if, as you say, every one is guilty of a sin who is not labouring that cesspools should be drained, and disinfecting fluids of all kinds be sought for—the time is come when those whose circumstances or whose ignorance disqualify them for those higher tasks, but who feel that there is a foul stench sent forth by our anonymous periodical literature and that they in times past if not now have contributed, as I have, to the increase of it, may think that they are bound before they die to do something, be it ever so little, for the purpose of purifying the moral atmosphere of the vanity, cruelty, falsehood with which it is impregnated. I will give you an instance of the way in which the use of simple names will work. If I do anything for this journal, it would probably be a review of Froude's History. Suppose I wrote an article as a We, what would be my course? To bestow a few patronising praises and malicious censures upon a man who knows just a thousand times as much of all the facts as I do, and has brought to his task an amount of earnest manly thought and wisdom which has really made the reign he has treated of a new one. Supposing I wrote in my own person, what should I do? I should confess how much he had taught me, how many mistakes and prejudices of mine he had corrected. I should say when, accepting his own statements and discoveries, I did not see my way to go along with him. I should recognise his view of the sixteenth-century reformation as on the whole the most helpful and luminous that I had found anywhere, and should try to indicate how I thought it might prepare us for the very different reformation which God is evidently intending for this generation, and in which we must be involved whether we are prepared for it or not. Now here is my answer to your dread that the "I" journal will especially be a cloak first for presumption, then for the moderatism or eclecticism which I think is as hateful to me as it can be to you. I believe a journal with names must be undertaken by men who feel that they dare not be braggarts and dare not be cowards; that they are arming themselves, and so far as they can are assisting others to arm, for a real battle, in which impertinence and frivolity cannot serve except to expose those who indulge in them.

'I have said already that I should protest against Hughes being exposed to any risk or liability. I protest as strongly against the notion that he is not fit for this undertaking because he is not a professionally literary man. I say boldly, we must have done with professional littérateurs if we want to have any honest, manly literature. And I answer those who demand their help, by an appeal to an experience which they can understand.

'What has been the most successful periodical of the nineteenth century; the one which gave the new tone to periodical literature? Certainly the 'Edinburgh Review.' And its strength lay in this, that it was begun by a set of young men, chiefly barristers, who were not littérateurs, who looked upon literature as subordinate to life and action. Therefore it had an influence which it has lost since it fell so much into the hands of literary hacks.

'If it is proved that Hughes must lose his reputation at the Bar by taking the course which helped to win Jeffrey and Brougham much of theirs, do not let him enter upon it. If the Review interferes in the least with his practice, he must hold to his first vows and break the later. But I think, and shall continue to think, that he is almost an ideal editor, because he is an honest free man, tied to no notions and theories about books, able to judge what is worthy to go forth whether he agrees with it or not; one who will fearlessly admonish a contributor, and never dictate or be squeamish. He will of course not review the current literature. Many can be got to do that. He will speak what he knows and nothing else. He says he wishes to preach, and he ought to have a pulpit if one can be found for him. Dixi.

‘P.S. Surely a less humble man than Hughes would believe he was wholly unfit for editing a Review, or pleading at the Bar, or teaching pugilism, if you and Taylor told him so.’

To Mr. Hutton.

‘1 Augusta Villas, Southborough, Tunbridge Wells, August 23, 1858.

‘I do not wonder that you should have been struck by an apparent contradiction in my doctrine respecting men as members of a body, and my eagerness that in their writings they should throw off the symbol of a corporation and each present himself as an I. To me the one position seems a consequence of the other. Because I desire that all men should regard themselves as forming one fellowship in a real and living Head, the formation of sects and corporations, grounded upon mere similarity of opinions, is that which I most dread. Believing our union to be as much a law of moral science as gravitation is a law of physical science, I must, indeed, see in all these formations and combinations the illustration of an eternal principle; I must desire that every sect, be it the narrowest and most exclusive in the world, should yet not disperse into its elements till it has realised the meaning of its union, and till its members are thus prepared to understand what place they have to occupy, what special duties they have to fulfil in the human commonwealth. With respect to the English Church I have felt and do feel bitterly how it is always on the point of drifting into mere sectarianism; and I know that it may make itself the most proud and self-exalting of sects. I rejoice that the parties within it do not suffer it to become a mere huge negation of Romanism and Calvinism. I rejoice that they compel us by their narrowness and savagery to feel after some ground in which Romanists and Calvinists may meet with the preservation of all that is distinctive (distinction being opposed to separation as life to death) and positive in each, not after a ground which both are forbidden to approach. To make Churchmen feel therefore that they are not members of a corporation bound together by certain professions of opinion, but that they exist to testify of a body to which men as men belong, has been the aim which I have tried to keep before me and which I have, with shameful feebleness, pursued.

‘Now it seems to me that journalism, with its symbol We, has more than anything else tended to keep alive the notion of sect fellowship, by which I mean fellowship in a certain more or less accurately defined set of opinions. I quite admit that there are journals—the National is far the most remarkable—which are trying honestly and faithfully to bear witness against the sectarian spirit. I do not even question that many which you and I should agree in calling intensely party journals, have dreamed of this object and have never consciously abandoned it. But in most cases I think they have been the great instruments of bringing out that which was most contentious and negative in the persons whom they represented, in getting rid of their nobler aspirations. This was eminently the case with the review which John Henry Newman edited, the ‘British Critic.’ I believe that he and his friends, standing on a feeble and rotten ground of Anglican tradition, were nevertheless striving earnestly in their own hearts, and in the ‘Traacts for the Times,’ to fight with sectarianism and to escape from it. The moment they started this review . . . the contradiction to their professions became too manifest and ridiculous. The more earnest sought for the complete traditional Church in Rome . . . Now had these men each spoken his own words in his own name he would have known whereabouts he was standing. There would not have been the miserable fiction of a union where no union was. So far as they did agree this agreement would make itself more felt for their differences. Each might have done his own part towards the discovery of the deeper ground of union which all had need of.

'I can understand, I think, what you say of the sensitiveness of the literary conscience where there is the sense of being responsible for others as well as yourself. Certainly I should wish that consciousness of mutual responsibility—of our words not being our own—to be developed more and more in each of us. I feel it sadly little, but I certainly feel it most when I write with my name. Then I have a sense, however weak, of personal obligation for what I say, to those who agree with me and those who differ from me. I feel bound to weigh my thoughts and my words, not so much because they may give offence to this or that man who belongs to my Church or to my acquaintance, but because they may hinder or help him, and therefore me also, in the way to truth. I think we have most of corporate sensibility when we most take all the burden of our position as actual men.

'The deeper subject of which you speak at the end of your letter is never far separated in my mind from this. Your honest statement to your own conscience and to others of the difficulty you feel is to me the best pledge and security that it will be removed. The sense of our substantial union as men with Christ, and of His union with the Father, sometimes come to me with overpowering conviction, not of delight such as a Santa Theresa or Fénelon may have felt, but of its stern, hard, scientific reality, which makes me long that I had the fervour and earnestness in making my belief known, which I admire, and ought not to envy, in other men. But at other times I can thank God for having granted me a cold, uncordial temperament and constitution on purpose that I may refer all love and all power of acting upon the reason and the conscience and the heart to Him. Some day I hope our tongues may be loosed, and that we may, as earnestly, speak of what we feel to be deep and universal, as we drop what we find to be only transitory and for a few.'

CHAPTER X.

"When it pleases God to send a reformer to His Church, upon his brow there is written 'Not peace, but the sword.'"—J. C. Hare.

"The punishment followed, and Tertullian remains as the standing example, the pillar of salt in the desert, to show how rage against heresy may terminate in heresy; how . . . if we tolerate in ourselves a confusion between opinion . . . and truth, we must end by exalting our own opinions against the Truth."—F. D. M., The Epistle to the Hebrews, p. xciii.

THE BATTLE WITH ORTHODOX AGNOSTICISM — MR. MANSEL'S BAMPTON LECTURES, 1858—'WHAT IS REVELATION?'—"MR. MANSEL'S EXAMINATION OF MR. MAURICE'S STRICTURES"—'SEQUEL TO WHAT IS REVELATION?'

IN our day some of those who call themselves "Agnostics" do not know whether they ought to go into a church at all. Some of them do not know whether they ought to take part in any ordinances of the Church; others repudiate every semblance of Christianity. The starting-point of sects is often curiously unlike what might have been expected from the position they have ultimately taken up. The name "Agnostic" was first assumed about 1869 by Mr. Huxley, but the leading Agnostics have never hesitated to affirm that for the origin of the modern form of the sect it is necessary to refer to an earlier date.* In 1858 Mr. Mansel, afterwards the Dean of St. Paul's, preached the Bampton Lectures of the year. "The whole substance of his argument," as Mr. Leslie Stephen, an avowed and brilliant

* The attitude of mind is no doubt at least as old as the days of "Zophar the Naamathite," so that the philosophic dispute may boast an antiquity at least equal to the Book of Job, the decision at the end of that book having by no means finally settled the matter for Job and against Zophar in the judgment of mankind.

Agnostic, has put it, "was simply and solely the assertion of the first principles of Agnosticism. Mr. Herbert Spencer, the prophet of the unknowable, the foremost representative of Agnosticism, professes in his programme to be carrying a step further the doctrine put into shape by Hamilton and Mansel." "Nobody I suspect would now deny, nobody except Dean Mansel himself ever denied very seriously, that the 'further step thus taken was the logical step.'" There are some historical inaccuracies in the above statement which it will be necessary to correct; but as evidence of the view taken at the present moment by one great body of those who agreed with Mr. Mansel, it is unexceptionable, seeing that Mr. Leslie Stephen has taken several public opportunities to manifest a strong repugnance to all my father's thought and works. Mr. Mansel's lectures were put forth at the time as the great bulwarks of orthodoxy against all assailants. They were intended to show that as men can know nothing of the infinite or eternal nature of God, they can only submit to "Revelation," as supplying rules of conduct and religious formulæ for belief. Now in a book, ostensibly depending for its argument upon the careful treatment of words, according to their definitions as laid down in it, there is throughout no explanation of the meaning of "Revelation." The Bible treated as a text-book which supplies certain dogmas, interpreted so as to confirm various currently received views of religion, appears to be virtually the equivalent of the word. More often than not it is practically used to affirm as indisputable the particular tenets of the writer and his friends, or of those whom he decides to be orthodox.

For my father, all that he held dear depended on his asserting for "Revelation" an altogether other meaning, as in accordance with the scriptural use of the word. His rejection of Unitarianism originally started from his belief in the existence of all those difficulties in the intellectual and spiritual conception of the absolute Being which Mr. Mansel skilfully set forth; from his belief in the Incarnation as having brought home to men in a man that very knowledge of God which Mr. Mansel declared to be impossible, which my father believed it to be the object of all Revelation to communicate to man. Whether in his earliest letters, after he had accepted the teaching of the Church of England as setting forth truth, or in his latest words, the central thought is always that he believes the "Infinite to be goodness and wisdom—to be at the ground of all finite goodness and wisdom—and to be guiding men by various processes, in various regions and ages, into the apprehension of that which by their constitution they were created to apprehend."*

As he says in a letter to his father (Vol. I. p. 133) at the time of his formal announcement of his faith—

'If I can honestly say of any doctrines, 'these teach me how I may converse with the holy and invisible God as a real living person,' for as such the Bible holds Him forth to me at every line; how I may overcome the difficulties to this intercourse which arise from His being unseen, from the evident impossibility of my forming a notion of Him by my own understanding, and from the unlikeness and dissimilarity of our characters: if they show me how my character may be conformed to His, not how His may be brought down to mine; if they inspire me with a desire for this intercourse, a delight in it and a conviction of its reality; just so far as I can, after strict examination, say this of any doctrines, just so far have I a test that they are the doctrines of the Bible, the true doctrines, the doctrines according to godliness.'

And again in the next letter, Vol. I. p. 134—

'The whole of history shows me that just so far as the true God has made Himself manifest, just so far has there been light, truth, and honesty in the world; and that in those nations to which He is not revealed, there is darkness, falsehood, and fraud. I know that it is out of the heart these proceed, from each separate human heart. I believe, therefore, that all the honesty and truth in the world has come from God, being manifested in the hearts of some men and from thence affecting the general course of society. Hence I feel sure that just so far as I can hold intercourse with Him I can be true and honest to myself.

* Preface, June 1871, to new edition of 'Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy.'

‘I know I was formed in the image of God. I believe if I could behold God I should reflect His image. But I cannot behold Him. God, I am told, is a Spirit, and I am of the earth—earthly. I cannot, and would not if I could, abandon my belief that He is a lofty Spiritual Being; I cannot throw aside my own earthliness. Now this seems to me the most important practical question in the world. I cannot put up with a dream in place of God. He is a Spirit, but He is a reality; a True Being in the highest sense. As such I must behold Him or not at all. To behold Him, therefore, in that way in which they could alone understand Him, in which they could converse with Him, namely as a man, was, I see more and more clearly, the longing desire of every patriarch, prophet, and priest from Adam downward. It was the desire of Moses, of Job, of David, of Solomon, of Isaiah; they were practical men, and they wanted a practical Revelation; a Revelation which they could understand and grapple. God, they knew, must be for ever the unsearchable, the mysterious. They would not for worlds He should be anything else; for it was the glory of Judaism that their God was not a visible intelligible idol, but an incomprehensible spirit. Yet they longed to behold Him, and to behold Him so that they could understand Him.’

His whole conception of preaching was the setting forth of Christ as the manifestation of the Divine character; as the Revelation, unveiling or making known to man the actual righteousness and love of God. This was the Gospel or good news which he believed that he had to preach. He believed that in proportion as men in private life or in history came to have a higher ideal of any kind, that ideal was in itself a more perfect knowledge of the nature of God arrived at through the manifestation of the Son the Word, in life or history. In this sense he always read the first verses of the first chapter of St. John. He believed that in the Divine perfection of the Son all things were made; that that perfection was one with the eternal nature of the Father and found its perfect expression or incarnation in the man Christ Jesus. To the verses of St. John he invariably turned when he proposed, say, to read the Greek Testament with one of his sons after a certain absence from home. If he at any time chose for reading one of the epistles, it was certain that he would first select those verses of the first chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, which turn on the words, "Who being the effulgence of His glory, and the very image of His substance, and upholding all things by the word of His power."

These sentences had, I am certain, never presented themselves to him as bearing any possible interpretation other than this: that the eternal had so manifested itself in the flesh, that utterly inconceivable as the Divine nature would have been without such a manifestation, yet that since it has been made we may be sure that, search where we may through all that eternity may contain, there can be in the infinite nature no variableness or shadow of turning from the character which Christ revealed in a man.

This is the central point of the theology which he sets forth in his answers at his ordination examination. Any one who will look at the sentences marked 4, 5, 6, on p. 160, Vol. I., will see that Manselism, long before it assumed that name, was in his conception to be reckoned among "those erroneous and strange doctrines" which he believed that on his admission to the priesthood he promised to "banish and put away." His letter to Mr. Kingsley, pp. 371-376, Vol. I., in answer to Mr. Kingsley's inquiry as to the right mode of reading the Bible, turns wholly upon his own conviction of "the truth that the Bible, as a means of attaining to the knowledge of the Living God, is precious beyond all expression or conception; but when made a substitute for that knowledge, may become a greater deadener to the human spirit than all other books."

Mr. Mansel's tone of absolute contempt for the utter absurdity of any such knowledge of God, as a vain conceit on the part of man, was for my father a blow at the very centre of all faith. There was nothing new for him in the position taken up by Mr. Mansel. Mr. Mansel's doctrine was, in its express terminology, the very one against which all through his life he had been struggling. If God was not "good" in the same sense in which Jesus of Nazareth went about doing good, his faith was vain. Nor had previous experience left him in any doubt as to the mode in which Mr. Mansel intended to employ his principle in relation to those questions which were much dearer to my father than life or reputation. Nothing was more curious throughout the whole of the controversy with Dr. Jelf in 1854, than the complete misunderstanding on Dr. Jelf's part of the real issue which my father had raised; but if Dr. Jelf had not clearly seen what the issue was, Mr. Mansel had seen it with perfect clearness. In a short pamphlet which he published at the time, Mr. Mansel showed that he saw that the attempt to defend the then currently received view in regard to Elysium and Tartarus was hopeless, if God's character was really shadowed forth in such sentences as "Can a mother forget her sucking child? Yea, she may forget, yet will I not forget thee," or if the character which Christ displayed on earth was a manifestation of the actual spirit of the eternal Godhead. Mr. Mansel had no wish to force the fiercest features of the Tartarean doctrine into any unpleasant prominence, but he had every wish to assume that what he called the "Revealed Doctrine of the Atonement" was, as a matter of fact and beyond question, what Archbishop Magee had, some years before, declared that it was. The privilege of "the elect" was clearly in his mind to be saved from a certain place of future torture and to enter into an elysium of personal enjoyment. It was by no means so clear to Mr. Mansel as it was to Dr. Jelf, that it was by the doom of God that men were consigned to the place of endless torment. But my father's proclamation of God as the friend and father of man, the deliverer out of sin and bondage; the habitual use of the words

"the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world" in contrast with the Calvinistic or current view of God's remitting the penalty which His justice had adjudged for sin;* the habitual assumption that all God's punishments were blessings not curses; that the great evil was not the punishment but the sin; that the direst hell conceivable (as he put it in one of his earliest Bubbenthal sermons, and in the 'Theological Essays') was the place where God left off punishing and left a man to his sin: all these conceptions from first to last were contemptible in Mr. Mansel's eyes, and in all his notes to his lectures he took care to leave no doubt of his intention to strike not only at the centre of my father's faith but at every thought which formed part to him of the good news which he believed that he had learned and was to deliver.

It was whilst Mr. Mansel's lectures were in course of delivery at Oxford that my father's attention was first directed to them. Dr. Thomson, the present Archbishop of York, at that time Preacher of Lincoln's Inn, came up from Oxford at the beginning of each term to preach at the morning service. In those days he sometimes walked back to luncheon at Russell Square between the services. At the beginning of one of the terms of 1858 he came, full of the subject of the Bampton Lectures, of which two or three had been already delivered. He described the crowded audiences eagerly listening to discourses of which it was certain that at least large portions were wholly unintelligible to the great majority of the hearers. He spoke of the matter as in its essence the most unalloyed Atheism that had been heard in England for generations. He described the immense popularity which the lectures were nevertheless acquiring, because they served as such an admirable excuse for laughing at all troublesome German and English thinkers, enabling all those, who never thought at all, to feel their own superiority to the fools who searched after wisdom. The subject, touched on in the vestry, was discussed throughout the walk home, and was begun anew at the luncheon-table. My father's attention having thus been drawn to the matter, he heard much of it from other friends at Oxford. Mr. Mansel was described to him as best known in Oxford as a common-room wit and joker; the lectures, one of them in particular, were spoken of as scarcely serious despite the tremendous nature of the subjects they handled. There can be no doubt that all these circumstances affected considerably the attitude and temperament with which my father entered upon what he himself regarded as the most important controversy of his life, the one which from this time forth was to colour all his subsequent work. Here, as it seemed to him, was that definite setting up of "religion" against God, which he had always been expecting as the clear manifestation of the evil tendencies of the time. If the words had been put forth by some solitary thinker, the object of popular hostility, as the expression of conclusions to which in bitter pain he had been led, my father would have treated them according to the principles set forth in his letter to the Lincoln's Inn congregation (Vol. II., p. 225), or in the extract from the published letter to Hare (Vol. I., p. 505)—principles which have been illustrated by his whole life. But the effect of the Lectures was to deal with all men troubled with doubts or difficulties on exactly the opposite principle to that; to give to the many the satisfaction of laughing at the earnest few who did not see their way. It was in fact, under the name of Orthodoxy, setting up the absolute domination of public opinion, the very power which my father looked upon as, in so far as it was the object of worship, the anti-Christ of the day. It represented that of which he had had in his youthful days so great a horror—the warning men "against feeling too strongly, thinking too deeply, lest they should find too much of the Almighty wisdom, lest they should be too conscious of the Almighty goodness."

* I am far from meaning that Mr. Mansel was a Calvinist; my statement no more involves that than the fact that my father objected to Mr. Mansel's mode of executing Mr. Frank Newman or Mr. Jowett involved his agreement with their opinions. It is my father's position as above to which Mansel objected.

It was certain that these lectures would become the staple of the instruction of large bodies of the clergy, and would set the mode in which they were to meet all new facts as they were discovered by science, all evidence of Assyrian inscriptions, all appeals by earnest men against the rules of conduct and principles of action fixed by the current opinion of religious coteries. For my father all these were part of the education into His truth which God was giving to the age. For the lecturer the current so-called "Orthodoxy" of the time, in fact the religious public opinion of the day, was the "Revealed Doctrine" on every subject.*

To my father it therefore seemed all important to set before the rising generation of young clergy another principle than that of the lecturer. He knew that no man could attempt a more unpopular task or one more likely to injure him in the estimation of all those who would concern themselves about it. Therefore he held it to be his duty to undertake it. He entered into the controversy under disadvantages which he had encountered in no other case. Mr. Mansel had treated his subject with the calmness and coolness of one who dissects an anatomical specimen. My father felt every cut of the lecturer's knife as though it had been employed upon his heart-strings. He did not realise, and indeed did not till long afterwards become fully aware, that the lecturer, bred up in the school of philosophy whose tenets he was expounding, and looking upon all outside it as mere folly, was pouring forth what were to him beliefs as genuine as my father's were to himself; that Mr. Mansel was not merely for a controversial purpose choosing arguments which he knew would carry with him his audience, but was urging what was for him the result of much study and much thought. In the first stage therefore of the controversy, that which is represented by the 'Bampton Lectures' and 'What is Revelation?' I do not think that any of my father's friends have ever read the discussion with entire satisfaction. He does not limit the points of his difference with Mr. Mansel; does not enter upon a methodic argument, does not, in a way that would attract the attention of a careless reader, acknowledge the points that are not in dispute and define those that are. What he does is to prophesy against the book, to declare what its inevitable tendency must be, how the weapon forged in behalf of orthodoxy will become a deadly one in quite other hands. In that sense it is curious how rapidly his assertions have vindicated themselves already. The Agnostics have become the very people by whom the Orthodoxy of the day finds itself most troubled.

* Both of course in their different ways appealed to the "teaching of the Church;" but while my father's appeal was always to the "Orthodox" faith, "provided the Creeds, the Liturgy, the Articles, are taken as the tests of Orthodoxy, and if it be a part of Orthodoxy to make the Bible a key to all other studies," it is difficult to convey an idea of the way in which in the Lectures, and still more in his 'Examination,' Mr. Mansel always assumed, that, just what he and his audience accepted as the correct tenet on every subject, was that which had been everywhere, by all, always held, or of the care with which he avoided explaining precisely what that was, lest he should scatter his unanimous following. It was not a little noteworthy that he, the champion of "orthodoxy," should find himself obliged to appeal against my father to Dr. Candlish, the Calvinist Presbyterian, and Mr. Rigg, the Wesleyan, (the only two assailants of my father whom he quotes in his 'Examination') seeing that both of these men had made their attacks expressly because of my father's influence in behalf of the Church of England, which they found to be too powerful among their sects.

But the discussion rapidly passed into another stage. Mr. Mansel, attributing to personal hostility the wrath which my father had shown against principles, and offended by what he considered a personal attack upon himself, became passionately angry, turned his counter-attack into one not easy to be sustained—on my father's character: accused him of deliberately writing down that which he knew to be untrue, and of having been guilty of "a tissue of continuous misrepresentation, which," Mr. Mansel believed, "had no parallel in recent literature." As a matter of fact, my father had transferred from the lectures bodily to his own columns about 40 out of 187 pages in all, giving in full, in the author's own words, all the passages which he discussed. He had earnestly entreated his readers to study the lectures for themselves, and to compare them with his comments. The very words in regard to which Mr. Mansel was not ashamed to accuse him of deliberately lying stood on the same page with the discussion on them which was thus characterised.

But there can be no doubt that my father's mode of controversy left upon Mr. Mansel and others an impression of sarcasm when that was furthest from his thought. Virtually, though doubtless not consciously, the assumption with which Mr. Mansel, like most men, entered into a controversy was that it was his one business to prove himself and those whose brief he held right and his opponent wrong. He therefore assumed his opponent to be meeting him on similar grounds. That my father never did. As he says of himself—

‘I am a very bad proselytiser. If I could persuade all dissenters to become members of my Church to-morrow I should be very sorry to do it; I believe the chances are that they might leave it the next day. I do not wish to make them think as I think. But I want that they and I should be what we pretend to be, and then I doubt not we should find that there is a common ground for us all far beneath our thinkings. For truth I hold not to be that which every man troweth, but to be that which lies at the bottom of all men's throwings, that in which those throwings have their only meeting-point.’*

It is that “and I” (not italicised by him) which makes the whole difference. Always in the very midst of every controversy, the mistakes he had made himself in past times, the lessons he had learned from them, would rise before him and be referred to by him, in a way most disturbing to an antagonist. That a man should hit himself and not leave his opponent to perform his own work in that way, seemed preposterous. Such expressions were therefore nearly always misunderstood; it is to them that Mr. Mansel refers in bringing some of his fiercest charges against the book. A single specimen will throw a good deal of light upon this sort of misunderstanding. Nothing in the Bampton Lectures had caused my father more distress than the mode in which the men to whose conclusions he was most opposed had been dealt with in it. The remembrance of Sterling and of what he considered had been his own mistakes in dealing with him, always rose up before him on these occasions. Under this feeling he wrote—

* ‘Theological Essays,’ p. 315.

‘He who holds that the Bible testifies from its first page to its last that God has created men for the knowledge of Himself, and is kindling in them a thirst for that knowledge, a discontent with anything which comes short of it—cannot by possibility listen without the profoundest interest to every cry of men after it in one age or another. He must not ask first what they have failed to attain, but what they have been permitted to attain. He must be glad to learn from their blunders as well as their successes; perceiving in the first the likeness of his own; in the second, the guidance of God. He may not expect their opinions or conclusions to do much for him; their struggles and questionings, and glimpses of light he will cherish, and be thankful for. All will appear to him to be pointing to a full-orbed Truth which is not in them but in God, and which He has manifested in the Eternal Word, the only-begotten Son. The remembrance of hard and proud words spoken against those who were crying out for Truth will be always the bitterest in his life, that which recurs to him with the keenest sense of having grieved the Holy Spirit of God, of having brought upon him the curse of a brother’s blood.’

Mr. Mansel’s mode of referring to this passage is: “The rest of Mr. Maurice’s first letter is devoted to vituperation instead of argument, and may safely be left to stand or fall by its own merits. He considers the Bampton Lectures to be full of hard and proud words, spoken against those who were crying out for Truth.” Seeing that Mr. Mansel was not one of those who held anything which the “He” of this passage is said to “hold,” it is difficult to understand his supposition that the "remembrance of hard and proud words" could be his.

Enough has, however, perhaps been said to show that in his reply Mr. Mansel had lost the enormous advantage of that philosophic calm which appeared in the Bampton Lectures.

An exactly opposite change in my father's manner appears in his 'Sequel to What is Revelation?' which he wrote in answer to Mr. Mansel's 'Examination.' The moment a personal attack was made on himself, his wonted anxiety to defend principles by the method of doing justice to his opponent, of meeting discourtesy with courtesy, of acknowledgment of any slips of his own, reappeared. As far as I have been able to ascertain, the general feeling of those who followed the controversy through to this later stage, was that he had, independently of the merits of the question, at least as much advantage in point of manner and method over his opponent in the latter part of the discussion as Mr. Mansel, no doubt, from his philosophic coolness had during the earlier part.

As regards the change which has taken place in men's views of the merits of the question, I do not know whether it is true, as Mr. Leslie Stephen says, that now-a-days "most believers repudiate Dean Mansel's arguments." I should have thought the statement one completely beyond the region of the "known and the knowable." What is historically the direct reverse of the fact is the statement that "nobody except Dean Mansel himself ever denied very seriously" that the further step into modern Agnosticism—old "Atheism" writ respectable—"was the logical step." The "religious" newspaper press as a body welcomed Mansel as the great champion of orthodoxy. If the grounds on which a quarter of a century ago my father had to run the gauntlet of party religious animosity for his vehement resistance to Agnosticism, when it appeared as the representative of "orthodoxy," crushing under its foot all opponents, were not "serious," one hardly knows what vehement expressions of religious feeling are to be considered serious.

In no case did he stand at the moment more nearly alone. As time went on Mr. Goldwin Smith and Arthur Stanley spoke out vigorously in Oxford against Mr. Mansel.

A few years later, Mill, on the philosophic side, fiercely assailed Mansel. Moreover, the course of the controversy itself in a very remarkable way added one to the number of my father's more immediate friends. The Times review of Mr. Mansel's lectures was written by Mr. Chrétien. The review had been a very complimentary and admiring one, but had pointed out consequences which might be feared by some readers if the lecturer's positions were established. One of those repeated accusations of personal want of "conscientiousness" with which Mr. Mansel's retort teemed, had turned on the mode in which my father had referred to this review. Mr. Chrétien on the appearance of 'What is Revelation?' first of all addressed my father, as a troubled but convinced admirer of Mr. Mansel's, in a letter describing "What is Revelation" in terms the exact reverse of those in which Mr. Mansel spoke of it in his almost simultaneously published reply. When Mr. Chrétien had had time to read the reply as well as the 'Sequel to What is Revelation?' and to spend the summer of 1860 in their study, he came completely over to my father's views, and his name appeared among a series of writings which were at that time being published by my father and his friends.

Though there was much that had been bitter and therefore unsatisfactory in the discussion itself, it had as a result this great advantage—that, for any one who chose to consider the matter at all, it lifted one of the most important of my father's contentions out of the mere stage of misconception, in which it had been left by the hasty impressions, formed at second-hand, about his purpose, in the Jelf discussion. It could not of course prevent such a dinner-table discussion as this: "I think Mr. Maurice's great glory was that he stood out against the doctrine of eternal punishment." "But he never did!" "Why, you take away from him his great distinction!" "You mean that he denied that the word 'eternal' was used by Christ as the equivalent of 'endless'?" "Oh, well, that's all the same." It could not prevent the fashionable lady novelist from talking about "Mr. Maurice's easy-going belief." It could not prevent any one who rejoiced in second-hand gossip, or those clergy, who, content to take their knowledge from second-hand mis-statements of Mr. Rigg, or of the religious newspapers, were not, in speaking to younger men, ashamed on such evidence to talk as though they knew all about him—from propagating falsehoods in all directions, from saying that he "denied the atonement," and the like. But the discussion itself was upon the true issue, not upon the secondary. "Is not your Gospel a message concerning the Infinite, the Absolute, the Eternal? Is not your Bible a book of facts by which men are led gradually on to know what the ground is at their feet; to feel, through the actual finite, for the Infinite—through the actual temporal for the Eternal?"* "Is it or is it not true that in the revelation of God in Christ the righteousness, truth, love, which cannot be measured by time, which do not belong to time, are brought within the faith and apprehension of the meek and lowly; that these constitute that eternal inheritance which God has prepared for them that love Him?"† It was scarcely possible for any who had touched upon this controversy to suppose as many had done, chiefly at second-hand, during the Jelf controversy, that he had some special "easy-going" sympathy with those who supposed that, "at the end of a certain term, say thirty or forty thousand years, we may believe that God's punishment of wicked men may be over, and they may be restored to favour," despite his vehement assertion, "I have an utter want of sympathy with statements of this kind: they clash with all my convictions." "I believe wickedness, impenitence, and unbelief, to be the worst tortures to which men can be subjected; that as the possession of righteousness, love, truth, constitute eternal blessedness, these constitute eternal damnation and misery ;” * or that some wish to soften off the idea of the actual nature of sin, and some wish to make its consequences seem less terrible, had induced him to devise a subtle interpretation which should take the sting out of the word “eternal” in the Athanasian Creed. It is difficult enough to understand how men could have read the ‘Theological Essays’ or the letter to Dr. Jelf, and so interpreted them. Thus, in speaking of the effects of “the love of God” he goes on : “In each case I have thought and spoken of that love as only removing punishment by removing sin ; I have desired, and hope always to desire, for myself and all men, that we may never cease to be punished by God till we cease to punish ourselves by rebelling against Him.” It is difficult enough to understand how it could have been supposed that his conception of the meaning of the word was derived from a single text, when throughout the Jelf controversy he had appealed to its actual use in every place where it occurs in the New Testament, and had actually worked out his own way to its meaning by years of thought upon that use. But at least the controversy with Mansel had brought out the force of his appeal to the Bible to show that the “knowledge of God” is the actual eternal life of which St. John, St. Paul, and Christ Himself, are everywhere speaking. It was difficult for those who had followed Mr. Mansel’s Lectures and his subsequent argument not at least to realise how much was involved in the question, or to fail to see that my father’s belief in the meaning of the word eternal was actually based on his belief that “if instead of coming to the Revelation of God in Christ to instruct me in the nature of God and eternity, I go back to my own notion of endlessness, and attribute that to God, I must fall into heathenism.” †

* 'What is Revelation?' p. 280.

† Page 8, final answer to Dr. Jelf.

The following passage gives in his own words the motives which determined him to undertake this and much other work, and shows just how and why his mode of controversy was liable to misinterpretation. I doubt if his most bitter

* Final letter to Dr. Jelf.

† Final letter to Dr. Jelf.

antagonist reading the passage by the light of his life can now fail to understand it.*

‘ Since my desire is to get all the help I can, and to give all the help I can, in resisting evils which I feel to be threatening the life of each one of us, of our country, of the whole Church, and in sustaining the good which I believe God is keeping alive in each of us, in our land, in the whole Church—I will, God aiding me, incur all risks of offending the leaders of scholastical thought and popular feeling amongst us, by pointing out what I hold to be the great religious and moral corruptions of the age, and will not run the risk of offending any simple Christian by fixing upon him, or upon some teacher whom he loves, as an example of these corruptions. I will tell my countrymen, and tell myself, that we are men of like tempers and passions with the worshippers of Moloch and of Mammon and of Siva. I will tell them that there is no security against our falling into that worship in the fact of our being surrounded with a Christian atmosphere, in our having been brought up to acknowledge all the mysteries of the Christian faith. I will tell them that God Himself is our only deliverer from false and dark notions of Him, and that if we do not trust in Him to save us from them and to give us the true knowledge of Himself, they will creep in upon us, and overcome us, and mould all our orthodoxy into their likeness. And if A, B, and C, being in conspicuous places from which they are influencing others, should seem to me to be abetting directly or indirectly this evil, I will do what in me lies to counteract their lessons. But if I have any occasion to speak against them, I will add that I do not hold them to be worse men than I am, and that I am satisfied they have a better and nobler spirit in them which is confessing the true God and rendering probably a more acceptable homage to Him than I render. I will say this because I hold it to be true and because I ought to say it, though I know perfectly well that such language will lead Mr. Mansel to suspect me of hypocrisy, and though it is sure to draw forth such pungent remarks as the one which he has quoted against me from Dr. Candlish. "It would really seem as if the author's notion of candour and charity were this: blacken your opponent to the utmost pitch of blackness, by making his belief thoroughly odious, and then generously whitewash him with the insinuation that after all his belief is a sham." If this description is a true one, as I am sure Dr. Candlish and Mr. Mansel consider it to be, it cannot do me much harm; the inward insincerity and wickedness in the sight of God of such a character as Dr. Candlish has portrayed, must make all the appearances it may present to men of little moment. If it is not exactly a faithful portrait, I may still have much to answer for, having led eminent men, through my violence or stupidity, to suppose that it is impossible to denounce with intense earnestness what one feels to be the mischievous acts or teachings of others, without exalting oneself or denying them to be capable of all excellence. I am certain that this cannot be impossible, otherwise there can be no reformation wrought in the earth; since the evils that prevail in an age have always hitherto been opposed by those who were bitterly conscious of those evils in themselves, and therefore sought to extirpate them.'

* ‘Sequel to What is Revelation?’ pp. 156–158.

It is necessary to quote this passage in full, because this personal humility towards those with whom he was at issue at the time that he fought most earnestly for the principles he was maintaining against them, is so unlike the tone of most men that it has led to very curious misconception in more than one instance. Notably Lord Carnarvon, a disciple of Mr. Mansel's, and editor of one of his posthumous works, has assumed that certain expressions of personal courtesy towards Mr. Mansel and of my father's wonted personal humility which appear in the preface to a new edition of the 'Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy' which was published a year before my father's death, implied more than I think such words from my father do at all imply. As it happened that he heard of Dean Mansel's death whilst he was publishing a vehement protest against Manselism, he inserted a note expressing his regret for any language he might have used in the controversy that had given pain to Dean Mansel's friends. He ends up with the words, "His immeasurable superiority to me as a disputant deepens my conviction that the principle which I maintained against him was sound and true—one which even his ability and learning could not shake;" but that is something very different from admitting that in the particular dispute between them he was worsted in argument by his opponent. On the contrary, it is the assertion of a man who believes that he gained a dialectical advantage over his opponent because of the strength of his case; despite, what he assumes to be, his relative inferiority. In fact, to his latest breath it was that very "knowledge of the love of God," the possibility of which Mr. Mansel denied, which was for my father the Gospel, the good news that he was to deliver to the city and the world.

The controversy occupied him throughout great part of 1858 and nearly the whole of 1859, and was not finished till 1860. The letters of the year 1859 which follow give some of the thoughts which were occupying him during the year.

To Mr. T. Erskine, of Linlathen, on the death of Miss Jane Stirling.

'5 Russell Square, W. C., February 10, 1859.

"Very many thanks for your kindness in letting me hear of the departure of your friend to her home. No one who has ever seen her fine and expressive face can forget it. Her clearness of thought and power of expression must have given her a great power as a servant of the truth, and I have heard through many of the work she did at Paris, especially among English ladies. It seems as if there was a gathering in of many whom we fancy we want grievously, but I have such a sense of an approaching crisis as near at hand that I cannot but thank God for all who have been permitted to pass out of the world before it comes, to help, I cannot doubt, in unknown ways those who are passing through it. The sermon which you speak of with so much kindness and sympathy—giving me a greater strength by doing so than I can well express—was written very much under the impression of this feeling. That the Bible should be defended expressly on the ground that the knowledge of God is impossible, and that this defence should be hailed in so many quarters as triumphant, gives me a kind of staggering sensation as if everything was turned upside down, and as if we were approaching a day in which the most utter denial would take the shape of unquestioning acquiescence. I feel as if one must lift up a voice against this, if it was only for the sake of the young men in Oxford, who must be tremendously shaken by such words coming from high quarters. But I tremble while I undertake the task, so many bad feelings mingle themselves with every controversy.'

To Miss Williams Wynn.

'5 Russell Square, February 12, 1859.

'I have been thinking much of your note, and of the very serious question which it raises. One's impulse is, no doubt, to dismiss Spurgeon's teaching as Tartarean, and to set down as a mere evil sign of the times that crowds should listen to it. But this, I am sure, is not right. It is right to say, if he or an angel from heaven preach any gospel besides that which St. Paul, St. John, preached—the Gospel of God's reconciliation with men—it is an accursed gospel, or no gospel at all. But when one considers what a wonderful thing it is for men to be recognised as spirits at all, and to hear that God recognises them as such, even if He only treats them as spirits that He may give them a destination which animals cannot have; when one thinks what a witness there is in the gathering of crowds to hear such a man, that they all have a common life and a common Father and common sins; when one feels how much more terrible sin and exclusion from love are than any terrors which a vulgar fancy can conjure up, I do believe that he may be doing a necessary work for this age, and that rich and poor who hear him may be actually receiving a truth from his lips which they had never known before: namely, the truth that a Living Being is looking after them and taking cognizance of what they think and do, and that all their talk about religion, philosophy, humanity, is just so much wind and nonsense. Any one who will scatter those abstract ghosts does them a service, yes, if he gives them little but hell and the devil in exchange. I hope Spurgeon gives them something else. His own future of course one has no right to speculate about. If he should waken up to the perception of a God of absolute love, his popularity will probably vanish, and he will have a terrible conflict with himself, perhaps a period of unutterable darkness and unbelief. But in the meantime he may help to save us from that, and to remind us clergymen what miserable witnesses we are for what we pretend to believe. May he drive me to a more earnest faith in a Gospel which I am certain neither he nor any man can set aside.'

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

'July 3, 1859.

'I do not differ from you about the existence of evil being the great crux of all. I learnt many years ago, from Augustine, that it must, by its very nature, be the unintelligible thing, that to attempt to reduce it to a law or principle is to commit a contradiction. The question is not that at all. It is whether the unintelligibility of evil or the omnipotence of God is a reason for not regarding Him as carrying on a war against evil and for not expecting that in that war evil will be vanquished. I know that there are some who think so. For God to make war instead of crushing evil, if it can be crushed at all, by a simple fiat, is for them a simple absurdity. What I say is, that if it be, the Bible is from beginning to end an absurdity. For it is the book of the wars of the Lord. It does not define evil, but it assumes evil; it assumes evil to be in a will; it assumes evil not to be vanquishable by an Omnipotent fiat; it sets forth a process by which it has been overcome in a number of wills; it teaches us to pray, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven," where it is done perfectly; it says that if we pray according to God's will He hears us and we shall have the petition which we ask of Him. Whether these assertions accord with Mr. Mansel's Carlton Club and Oxford common-room yawn, "'Pon my soul, I can't see why evil should not last for ever if it exists now," I leave simple people to judge. I do not see why he should think otherwise, for evil to him is like everything else—a notion. But it is not a notion for you; you feel that you must fight with it to the death. And if you do not frankly confess what in your heart you believe, that God is fighting against it, you will be obliged to feel that you are fighting against Him. Your attempt to escape from this doctrine which goes through the whole of the Bible—that being nothing else than the book of the wars of the Lord—convinces me that I was right in the strong language I used, and that there is a scepticism in all our hearts—I am sure there is a deep scepticism in mine—on the subject which can only be removed by earnestly thinking what the agony and bloody sweat of Christ must mean, whether that was not the battle of God with that which is resisting His nature. I think I am also right in speaking of eternal death. I know no other language which will bring as strongly before our minds the principle which Scripture assumes, that death is not the departure of the breath out of the body, but the loss of the life which must be the eternal life of God. At all events, what is done is done. If I had taken advice, I should have let Mr. Mansel alone altogether; but there are monitors within which must be obeyed whatever voices without contradict them.'

To Mr. Alexander Macmillan.

'Ockham, September 1, 1859.

'I have had a bundle of reviews [of 'What is Revelation?'] forwarded me, all except the Inquirer exceedingly unfavourable. My flesh of course revolts ; but in my heart of hearts I welcome this treatment. If the religious world had not declared almost en masse in favour of Mansel I would not have written against him. I spoke because he was its spokesman. So it has happened exactly as I ought to have expected. I am only sorry on your account.'

To Rev. D. J. Vaughan.

(In answer to a letter as to the several persons of the Trinity, and their action on the spirit of man.)

'September 3, 1859.

'There cannot, I think, be any subject so important for us at one time or other, but especially at this time, as that with which your mind has been exercised. I am well convinced that it is God and not man who sets such problems before us, and that it is He who shows us the way of solving them.

'No passage, perhaps, on the whole is so helpful for this purpose as that in the third chapter of the Epistle to the Ephesians, "For this cause I bow my knees," etc., chiefly because it does not give us a formal result, but explains the process, the continual process, by which the apostle himself arrived at a living result. He bowed his knees to a Father, not of himself but of a whole family in Heaven and earth. He asked not for himself apart from the Ephesians, but with them, that they might be strengthened with might by the Spirit in the inner man. But this involved the next step: Christ would dwell in their hearts by faith. And that would lead to the next. They would find the ground on which they and all creation stood: "Being rooted and grounded in love." And so they would know the height and length and breadth of the love of God which passeth knowledge.

'Here, I conceive, is the doctrine of the Trinity in its most practical form, yet with all its most delicate distinctions; no confounding of the Persons, no division of the substance. And thus is it received and has it been received in all ages.

by thousands of men and women in weakness and suffering, who were as utterly unable to enter into scholastic subtleties as they were to fly over the moon. They arrived, in the act and exercise of prayer, at the root of all these distinctions. The habit of looking up to a Father hindered them from ever thinking that the Spirit who drew their hearts to Him was their own spirit. He must be a universal Spirit, a Spirit working in others as well as themselves; working to unite them. He must have proceeded from the Father, but He leads them not directly to the Father, but to One who has come from Him to redeem them, in whom only they are redeemed or righteous or sanctified, to whom they refer themselves, in whom they find themselves, through whom only they can see what the Father is. And perceiving in Christ that He is the infinite and eternal Love, they are certain that the Spirit who worketh in them, the Spirit of Love, is the eternal bond of unity between the Father and the Son, as He is between them on earth. As He is their guide and comforter, and the guide and comforter of myriads besides them, as they have resisted Him and He has overcome them, they cannot regard Him otherwise than as a person. All the acts and qualities which they attribute to any present friend dwell supremely in Him. Yet because He is in them, speaking to them, they must distinguish, though they can never separate, Him from that Lord whom they must always think of as the common Lord of all, as the Mediator between man and God, as standing at the right hand of God, as their way to the Father. Just as likewise they must always distinguish the Son from the Father, whom He trusts and loves and obeys, whose will He does, whose perfect image He is.

‘I should not have dwelt so much upon this text if I had not known, in my own small experience, that it is one which is very dear to simple people, and one upon which some of them meditate day and night. It seems to me to contain the resolution of that difficulty which you feel so strongly—and not more strongly than a multitude of laymen and clergymen—about the Christ in us and the Spirit in us. We should never forget that Christ is the Anointed of the Spirit; that St. Paul, the great witness for Christ as made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, says, "If we have not the spirit of Christ we are none of His." Those chapters in the Epistle to the Romans contain, it seems to me, the most skilful and profound exposition of that relation between the subject and the object which our formal schoolmen make into such a hard crust for the understanding to bite through. It is not a school formula, it is a living principle in the very nature of things and of man. And it is in the nature of man because its prototype is in the nature of God. We realise it in that distinction and union of the Spirit in us, with Christ in and over all, which St. Paul sets forth. That distinction and union imply a Father from whom the Son comes, of whom the Spirit testifies. That unity of the Father and the Son and the Spirit, one God of Love blessed for ever, is beneath all.

*It seems to me that we may in this way ascend from the Pauline Theology, which is that of the Reformation, that of our Evangelicals, to the truth which, as you hint, modern Evangelicals, and in some, though not in the same, degree, their fathers, have converted into a mere explanation of our justification and sanctification, and so have grievously imperilled. They will, I trust, be led through their own wonderful teacher to look at the Gospel less selfishly, to regard it as a Gospel for mankind; then the full meaning of the old Creeds will come out of them. If not, they will be distanced by the Unitarians, many of whom are rising, through their old confession of a Father, and their new apprehension of a Spirit working in them—not without many plunges down into a Pantheistic abyss—to that real and profound belief in the "Divine Unity," which they were groping after through what Coleridge called their "Worship of Unity." Having been bred amongst them, I must needs sympathise much in struggles to which I owe everything. Nor have I any greater cause for thankfulness than this, that God did not suffer me, in the fierce reaction against their denials, and what appeared to me their feebleness, to lose sight of the truth which is implied in their name; although in the pursuit of it I have been led to the very opposite point of the compass from theirs. With respect to your remarks that the Old Testament was the preparation for the Son, as the New may be the preparation for the Spirit, I would observe:—

- ‘(1.) That the New Testament opens with the announcement, “He shall baptize with the Spirit;” that the baptism of Jesus Himself with the Spirit is inseparable from the account of Him as the Son; that He goes by the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted by the evil spirit; that the whole battle of His life on earth as described in the Gospels is with evil spirits; that the gift of the Spirit at Pentecost opens the New Kingdom of which the declaration, “He whom you crucified is both Lord and Christ,” was the formal proclamation; that the distinction between the Old and New is always expressed in the words, “That which was hidden before, God has now revealed to His holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit.” I think, then, that the old opinion is right. We are in the age of the Spirit; not looking forward to it.
- ‘(2.) The Old Testament revealed neither the Father nor the Son as such. What strikes me most in opening the Gospels,—say, at the Sermon on the Mount—is this new name of Father. One has had the hint of it in the heathen world, in the old “mythologies;” at first one is inclined to say, “Scarcely a hint in the Law and the Prophets.” Look again, and you see not hints, but an orderly preparation for this revelation; or, to speak more correctly, the commencement of it. The revelation of an unseen guide and protector is the foundation of the Abrahamic family. The Revelation of the guide as the I am, the absolute Lord and Law-giver, is the foundation of the Jewish commonwealth and code. The revelation of the King sitting on the holy hill of Sion, of my Lord, to whom the Lord says, “Sit at my right hand,” is the foundation of the Jewish royalty. The Revelation of the Word speaking to and in the holy men is the foundation of the Jewish prophecy. Everywhere is the proclamation of a One God; in the law the formal curse and denunciation of the worship of any god but the One. Yet all the wonderful defence against idolatry and the experiences of the slavery to which it leads, are not discoveries of the Divine Unity. The impulse to human and to animal worship is tremendous; the best men are most agitated with the question, "How can He whose glory is above the heavens care for us worms upon earth?" The Israelite felt the deep necessity of believing in the Protector, Friend, Lawgiver, King, Inspirer. That necessity drew him to prayer. In prayer he attained a sense of unity which in the world he could never find. That one should stand forth and say, "I am that King of whom David spoke, the King who has been reigning over you so long:—I was with Abraham; I know the innermost meaning of the Law that was given on Sinai; I am the Word who spoke to the prophets," would not have satisfied the wants and cravings that had been awakened in Israelites, unless He could have said also, "I came from a Father; I will baptize you with the Holy Ghost." He was expected; He was the desire of that nation and of all nations. But He would not have accomplished the expectation and desire, they must still have looked for another, if He had not been able to say this, and to do what He said.

(3.) And so, I think, we arrive at the explanation of St. John's words, "The Spirit was not yet, because that Jesus was not yet glorified." The Baptism with the Spirit is the recognition of men, of men of every nation, and kindred, and tribe, as the sons of God in the only-begotten Son; the acknowledgment of men as spirits capable of holding communion with the Divine Spirit, capable of falling under the dominion of evil spirits, redeemed from that dominion by God Himself, consecrated to be His ministers. The Baptism of the Spirit was thus the formation, out of a particular nation, of a universal society capable of adopting all nations into itself, a society having its home both in earth and Heaven; witnessing of God's love and gracious purposes to all the kindreds of earth; witnessing that they are, as spiritual beings, under the direct government of God Himself. Nothing like this had been or could be in the former days. Till Christ was glorified, till it was fully declared that the Son of Man is the Son of God by the resurrection from the dead, till it was shown that the barrier of death does not separate the two worlds, there could not be this manifestation of a personal Spirit dwelling in a Universal Church.

‘But though I differ from you in thinking that we are to wait in any sense for the Spirit as the gift of a future dispensation, I fully agree with what I take to be the meaning of the observation, that we have much to learn, perhaps a tremendous crisis to pass through before we learn, respecting our own position as baptized with the Spirit and so made children of God. I foresee a terrible breaking down of notions, opinions, even of most precious beliefs, an overthrow of what we call our religion—a convulsion far greater than that of the sixteenth century—in our way to reformation and unity. Still I believe they will come, and that they will come through an unveiling to our hearts of the old mystery of the Trinity, in which our fathers believed, but which they made an excuse for exclusion and persecution, not a bond of fellowship, a message of peace and deliverance to mankind. The preaching of the Trinity in its fullness will, I conceive be the everlasting Gospel to the nations, which will involve the overthrow of the Babel polity, and the brutal tyrannies as well as the foul superstitions of the earth. So long as we substitute for it the preaching of God as the destroyer, not the righteous Judge of men, so long as we deny that He has revealed Himself in the Lamb that was slain from the foundation of the world; so long I believe the inhabitants of the world will not fall before us, and that it is not good for them that they should.

‘These last hints belong to another part of the Bible than the Pauline epistles. I believe the Apocalypse to be the book which will at last be found to remove most veils from this mystery, as well as from the meaning of all the previous Bible history, and from the course of God's government of the world from the beginning to the end. But on that subject I must not enter now.'

'Ockham, Ripley, September 26, 1859.

'MY DEAR STRACHEY,

'I have been taking the duty of this village (William of Ockham's) all this vacation. The squire is Dr. Lushington, the freshest and heartiest as well as kindest of old gentlemen. His family has been all that we could desire for friendliness and for parish activity.'

To Rev. J. Ll. Davies on his marriage.

'MY DEAR DAVIES,

'Broadstairs, October 11, 1859.

'I thought it would be useless to write to you sooner; for I hoped you had had the wisdom to desire that no letters should be forwarded to you. But I must send you a line to say how great a delight it was to Mrs. Maurice and to me to see your cards; and how heartily we hope that the joy which I am sure has been given you is to increase more and more year by year. I do believe that the beginning of months is not the honey month; that those which follow are much brighter and sweeter, and that even when the clouds gather. However, there is something very wonderful in the opening of a new life to those who can appreciate it, and whatever it contains of records and promises I hope you and Mrs. Davies have had abundantly.'

CHAPTER XI. ¹

“Never a brave reformer tries to break down a popular sin or to build up some new and needed progress, taking on himself the responsibility which a true man ought to take, but these self-satisfied critics gather around him to criticise his methods and to ridicule his blunders, but never lift a hand to show how they too would blunder if they let themselves step outside of their safe and limited and petty life.”—Philips Brooks.

LORD EBURY'S SCHEME FOR THE REVISION OF THE PRAYER-BOOK—
‘THE LITURGY AND THE DISSENTERS’—APPOINTMENT TO ST. PETER'S, VERE STREET—FURIOUS ATTACK ON HIM—APOLOGIA PRO VITÂ SUÂ IN LETTER TO A FRIEND—A STRANGER'S PROTEST AGAINST MISSTATEMENTS ABOUT HIM—COUNTER MOVEMENT AROUSED BY THE ATTACK—FINAL BLOW TO THE TYRANNY OF THE ‘RECORD’—‘ESSAYS AND REVIEWS’—THE PANIC—‘TRACTS FOR PRIESTS AND PEOPLE’—WOLFF'S TRAVELS.

In the April number of ‘Macmillan's Magazine’ for 1860, an article of my father's, “On the Revision of the Prayer-Book, and the Act of Uniformity,” appeared. It discussed the changes then proposed by Lord Ebury, and was in substance a review of a pamphlet by Mr. Isaac Taylor on ‘The Liturgy and the Dissenters.’ It is to this article that the next letter refers.

To the Rev. Isaac Taylor.

‘MY DEAR SIR,

‘April 10, 1860.

‘Your kind and friendly treatment of an article which might easily and excusably have annoyed you, deserves my warm thanks. That you should remember any former instructions of mine with pleasure and should still regard me as a fellow-labourer, is a sincere satisfaction to me. But it is a much greater satisfaction that you should accept so cordially the doctrine that God has claimed us all in Christ as His sons, which seems to me the articulus stantis aut cadentis ecclesiæ; where I use article not in its vulgar sense as importing that which is formal and dogmatic, but that which is necessary to the vitality and coherency of the body of Christ. Individuals may hold fast the faith of their own adoption while they rather rejoice to think that mankind are accursed; but the Church must either fulfil its witness of a redemption for mankind, or be cut off. And I cannot help thinking that a time is at hand when we shall awaken to this conviction, and when we shall perceive that what we call our individual salvation means nothing, and that our faith in it becomes untenable when we separate it from the salvation which Christ wrought out for the world by His incarnation and sacrifice, resurrection and ascension.

When you add to the assurance of your own belief the statement that the Dissenters embody the idea of the Divine Fatherhood in all the forms of prayer which they approve (though I should like more specific illustrations of it that I might know what exactly it amounts to), I yet take it with all thankfulness and joy. But it strengthens me in my conviction that such changes as the Evangelical clergy of our own communion are likely to desire and recommend cannot meet the wants of the Dissenters. For certainly they assent with manifest reluctance to the broad language of the Catechism and of our prayers; and when that language is transferred from the Liturgy into any unauthorised forms, they pronounce it heretical. A friend and old pupil of mine sent me, only a fortnight ago, some family prayers of his, which he said his friends and neighbours among the clergy had declared to be very objectionable solely on this ground. I have been listening during the last week to sermons in this place, which are, I apprehend, good average specimens of watering-place divinity. The tone in them is uniform.

In a certain sense all men being created by God are His children; in a somewhat more enlarged sense that name may be given to the baptized, in the only true and important sense it is restricted to the true believers; to those who are conscious of having Christ as their personal Saviour. In this way the Gospel of God to man is emptied of its power; faith, not God, is made the source of every good and perfect gift.

Now, can one, who regards this inversion as one which is as much undermining the faith and morality of this generation as the glorification of works undermined the faith and morality of the sixteenth century, patiently consent that the Liturgy should be remodelled by the hands of those who are sanctioning it? I am convinced that they are sanctioning it against their higher and diviner instincts; that the opposition to it comes from the striving of the Spirit of God in them; that when they adopt the words of the Liturgy as it is, they are not affronting their consciences but only the opinions of their school. The distinction, I own, is a perilous one. I do not wish that they should be forced to make it. I would abolish the Act of Uniformity that they may not be forced to make it. I would do this with my eyes open; knowing their power; knowing the influence they possess with the bench of bishops; knowing that I and others who think with me are far safer under the protection of an Act of Parliament than we should be if left to the mercy of an ecclesiastical public opinion, dictated by the journals, executed by the episcopate. But such considerations ought not, I conceive, to move us in the least. Let us have an honest clergy at all hazards, or as honest a one as we can get. But do not let us surrender the one great witness which we possess, that a nation consists of redeemed men, sons of God, that mankind stands not in Adam but in Christ. Give up the Prayer-Book to an Evangelical or semi-Evangelical commission, and this witness will be eliminated from it by a thousand little alterations, which will be counted insignificant; but which will in fact render the English Church another Church altogether.

“But the Broad Church will have its representatives in such a commission!” I do not know well what the Broad Church is. I always took it to be a fiction of Conybeare’s. If it means anything, I suppose it is a representation, under different modifications, of that creed which is contained in Whately’s books, or of that which has arisen at Oxford out of the reaction against Tractarianism. Now I must say that I would rather trust a living Book to the lowest churchman who had imbibed any of his lore from Newton or Romaine, than to these accomplished and tolerant persons. Personally I have the greatest respect for them; so far as they protest against any cowardice and deceit in handling the Word of God, against any misrepresentations of sceptics,’ [i.e., by orthodox men of sceptics] ‘against traditional hardness or formality, so far I am willing to bear any disgrace with them. But that which seems to me the great disease of our time, that we talk about God and about our religion, and do not confess Him as a living God; Himself the redeemer of men in His Son; Himself the inspirer of all right thoughts, the guide into all truth by His Spirit, is characteristic of no school so much as of this (I mean when it resolves to be a school). The Liturgy has been to me a great theological teacher; a perpetual testimony that the Father, the Son, and the Spirit, the one God blessed for ever, is the author of all life, freedom, unity to men; that our prayers are nothing but responses to His voice speaking to us and in us. Why do I hear nothing of this from those who profess to reform it? Why do they appear only to treat it as an old praying machine, which in the course of centuries gets out of order like other machines, and which should be altered according to the improved mechanical notions of our time? Since I wrote my article Mr. Hildyard has done me the honour to send me his Ingoldsby Letters, which I had not seen before. I have read them with much respect for his ingenuity, and not protesting at all against his use of ridicule. Valeat quantum valebit; if he has the gift of wit, by all means let him use it with the same sense of responsibility as any other gift. But I cannot say that I rise from his letters with the impression that he is likely to be the Luther or even the Erasmus of a new reformation. The inconvenience of a sixteenth century praying machine for the use of the nineteenth century, is continually present to his mind. I should have liked just one word to explain what he thinks praying in the Spirit is ; at least I should have wished that one who stands forth as a tribune of the inferior clergy against the bishops should speak to the nobler instincts in the inferior clergy, and should not take it for granted that they must be actuated by the very low motives which he attributes to those of the diocese of Lincoln.

‘Your own method of handling the subject was, I am quite sure, distasteful to you. You would much rather have appealed to our spiritual instinct than to our material interests, to our consciences than to our fears. You adopted the latter course because you thought it would be most effectual for the object you were aiming at, though least agreeable to yourself. But must not this judgment, which I am sure you did not form without deliberation, make us a little suspicious of that object ? It is very well to say that, if we listen to the lower argument, you will afterwards meet us on the other ground. My dear sir, how can you ? We are debased and demoralised by that desire to promote our material interests, by that policy of over-reaching the more hostile Dissenters. We are not in condition to attend to those better lessons which you have kept back. Oh, surely the deeper we are sunk the more we want to have that strengthened in us which is ready to die ; the less we can bear any cultivation in us of that which is sordid or cowardly.

‘I am sorry you thought I did not deal fairly with you about justice to the Dissenters. I knew that the part of your pamphlet which referred to the fears of the clergy, was meant to be distinct from that which pleaded for compensation to the Nonconformists of this day, on the ground of the wrong that was done to their forefathers at the Restoration. But you will see why, from my point of view, it was impossible to recognise this distinction. I thought the argument you addressed to the fears of the clergy, involved an injustice to that which you yourself represented as the most increasing, if not the largest sect of the Dissenters, implicitly to the whole body of them. I thought that injustice was precisely the one which would have been committed at the Restoration, if Baxter and the (so-called) moderate Presbyterians had been admitted as ministers of the National Church and so had acquired the power of putting down the Independents, Anabaptists, Ranters, Millenarians, Arians, Socinians. The justice which would remove certain passages of the Liturgy now, because Baxter and his friends were cheated of their fair demands in 1661, could not, so I judged, have any other effect than to make the Church plus its recruits from the Dissenters a more exclusive body towards all the rest than it is at present.

‘I must apologise for this long letter. You may be right in thinking that the old Act of Uniformity is less likely to be repealed than a revision of the Liturgy to be sanctioned by a new Act of Uniformity. But as I regard the first measure as reasonable and justified by experience; the second as unreasonable, and as refuted by experience; the first as having many strong moral recommendations; the second as deriving all its force from those appeals to fear and to material interests which you have pressed with so much ability, I surely am not bound to treat the two as only differing in strength and in degree. They are, I think, essentially and directly contrary propositions.’

To his Wife.

‘July 7, 1860.

‘P. has asked me to breakfast on Thursday, to meet a Mr. Best, who, she quietly observes, is very useful to idiots; so of course I must go.’

In July 1860, he was appointed to the Chapel of St. Peter’s, Vere Street. The incumbency was in the gift of the Crown through the Board of Works, of which Mr. William Cowper was Chief Commissioner. The Record was the more aghast that its arch-enemy should have had any appointment offered him by the Crown, because that appointment was made under the administration of Lord Palmerston, its favourite Minister, and by his own step-son. It sent forth a shriek of horror; called upon the clergy to protest, upon the Bishop of London to resist the appointment. It is difficult, in 1883, to convey an impression of the kind of influence which this newspaper had once exercised. Eighteen years before the date of which I am now writing, the Bishop of London had endeavoured by explicit directions to his clergy to solve the question of the hour. The Record thereupon issued its counter-mandate to London. It was gradually obeyed by the majority of the clergy and of their flocks. The Bishop, to escape the storm, judged himself compelled to abandon all those clergy who had obeyed him, and to approve the action of those who had refused to follow his advice. Its words were looked upon as a kind of oracle for all those who wished to be called "religious," and under the cover of the desire of the clergy to be so esteemed, it employed itself in the habitual practice of holding up to obloquy all who did not submit to its dictation. It maintained its own power, its own circulation, its own influence, by denouncing all who did not subscribe to its formulæ. At one time when one of its accusing articles was published, the Standard, the Morning Advertiser, the Morning Herald, and the John Bull—not unfrequently the Morning Post—copied them verbatim, and the article was assumed to throw quite a halo round the page on which it was written. Moreover the practice in many Evangelical families in those days was very much like that of the Church of Rome in regard to an Index Expurgatorius. The formulæ of the sect in their narrowest, in their least spiritual sense, were assumed to be so absolutely "the Truth," that there was something a little wicked, in even glancing at any books, which did anything more than formally repeat the received commandments of the men who assumed to themselves infallibility.

An "Evangelical" clergyman who had my father's books upon his table required some courage, and was likely to suffer the next time he wanted to get help for parochial work from any established fund. Under cover of this security that no reply would reach their readers, the Record habitually represented to them that my father's opposition to the paper was due to a hatred of Evangelicals as such. Seeing that for my father the body was represented by his sister Emma, the falseness of this charge may be measured by those who have read his letters about her. Habitually also their mode of fighting him was to represent him as believing what he did not believe, often the exact contrary of that which he in the plainest terms declared that he did believe.

No very clear evidence of the shrinking of the power of the Record up to 1860 had appeared. The more submissive of its clients immediately proceeded therefore to obey its dictation, and an address signed by a small number of London clergymen was presented to the Bishop of London praying him not to institute my father to the ministry of the Vere Street Chapel.

Such things were by no means matters of indifference to him. The fingers that were on every occasion stretched out to pull from the fire the chestnuts that many men felt ought to be withdrawn by some one, were almost skinless in their exquisite sensitiveness.

Much as he felt the difficulty that he had in reaching strangers, keenly as he was pained by the consciousness that to many good men he was presented in a light that would make him wish them to hate all that he was supposed to teach, there was one subject on which he was even more sensitive. His own practice of standing out instantly for justice in behalf of a man from whom he differed, who was for the moment unpopular and therefore the object of the attacks of all popularity hunters, made him dread to involve any one else in the obloquy he so drew upon himself. He was therefore for ever putting in practice the story told of the eider-nest hunter, who cut the rope above his own basket, fearing that if he did not thus send himself to the bottom of the precipice the weight would be too great to be drawn up safely to the top. With the greatest wish to keep up his connection with old friends, and with a great delight in any successes that attended their career, he yet as soon as any of his friends began to arrive at positions of importance in the world, more and more tended to throw on them the whole task of keeping up the friendship, and on very slender provocation was ready to sever the link lest his unpopularity should drag them down. It was therefore very shyly that at this moment he asked one of his oldest friends, who had become a dignitary of the Church, to put his signature to the paper which is required by law to be signed by three clergymen on an incumbent being inducted into a living. The other facts are explained in the letter itself.

‘MY DEAR Q., ‘Lilleshall, Newport Salop, August 23, 1860.

‘When I left my letter at the Athenæum I had great doubts whether it would come into your hands before the time in which I must go to the Bishop. As I was bound to ask for testimonials from those who knew me, I could not quite make up my mind not to apply to you, as you had known me longer than any clergyman in the diocese. At the same time, I had great misgivings lest I should be putting you into an uncomfortable position. I therefore directed my note to the club, leaving the result to the accident of your calling there. It has turned out just as I should have wished. You have been saved from an embarrassment; and my request has procured me the frank and friendly letter which I received yesterday. My only regret is that you should have waited for such an occasion to admonish me respecting any statement of mine about sacrifice, or any other subject which seemed to you erroneous. I think I should have been most grateful for any hints you could give me; that I should have defended myself if I thought your objections were untenable, and have confessed that I was wrong if you showed me that I was. As I do not know to what particular passages in my books you object, I must speaking somewhat at random. But I may be explicit even if I do not refer to specific points; there is no subject upon which I desire more to be explicit.

‘Every year and day convinces me more that our preaching will be good for nothing if the main subject of it is not the atonement of God with man in Christ—if we may not proclaim His sacrifice as a finished work; if we may not ground all our sacrifices upon it; if we stop short of the Eucharistic proclamation that God of His tender mercy hath given us His Son to be a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world. Any notions, theories, practices, which interfere with the fulness of this Gospel deprive men, it seems to me, of a blessing which has been bestowed upon them and to which they have a right—deprive them of the only effectual foundation for social and individual reformation.

‘What I say of preaching, I say also of prayers. If they are separated from the confession and presentation of the perfect Sacrifice, once made—if they are not petitions that the will which is expressed in that sacrifice may be done on earth as it is in Heaven, if they are not presented through the High Priest and Mediator within the veil—they are, in my judgment, not Christian prayers. I say not that they are ineffectual; for it is He who makes prayers effectual which are very dark and ignorant (otherwise what would become of us?); but I say that they are anticipations of a Gospel—attempts to reach an unknown, unrevealed God—not derived from the Gospel of God, from the revelation of the perfectly righteous and loving Being in the perfect Mediator.

‘Starting from these premises, I am bound to say that I do look upon many of the most popular statements respecting the Atonement, as interfering with the fulness of this Gospel, as interfering with the finished work of Christ, as robbing an immense portion of mankind of the blessing which the Bible declares to be theirs, as having the effect of inverting prayers, of divorcing them from Christ’s sacrifice, of changing them into petitions that God’s will should not be done, but should be changed. I look upon these popular notions as exceedingly natural, as embodying thoughts and feelings which every man ought to be acquainted with in himself, and to deal most tenderly with in others, as containing elements of old pre-Evangelical philosophy which all students and divines ought to be familiar with; but as forming no part of the message from God to man, except so far as that message meets all the confused speculations and anticipations of the human heart, and satisfies its inner craving after God, and its secret testimonies respecting Him, by sweeping away the dark imaginations which it must form of Him when it creates Him after its own likeness. All notions respecting a conflict in the Divine mind between the claims of justice and mercy; all notions of the Son winning from the Father that which did not proceed from His own free, gracious will; all notions which substitute the deliverance from punishment for the deliverance from sin; all notions which weaken the force of the words, or make them anything less than the classical words on this matter, "Lo, I come to do thy will, oh God," are, it seems to me, of this kind, subversive of the Divine Revelation, Rationalistic in the worst sense of that word, not to be countenanced or tolerated; to be avoided even at the risk of parting with words in themselves innocent and useful (provided they are not Scriptural words, which will always be found safe and sufficient); not to be played with or tampered with from any worldly calculation that the humble and meek cannot afford to dispense with them, seeing that the humble and meek crave for the pure milk of God's word that they may grow thereby, and are cruelly treated when those whom they reverence introduce any adulterations into it; or from any equally worldly calculations that those who doubt or deny the Atonement will take courage from the effort to separate the Gospel and the Church message concerning it from the elements which have defiled it, seeing that these elements are the great justification of their unbelief to the consciences of the sincere, seeing that those who merely cultivate unbelief as a profession, hate nothing so much as these efforts to distinguish, and as those who make them. These are my convictions, which have grown stronger and stronger in me in every day, so far as the grandeur and necessity of the divine Atonement has been more manifested to me; weaker and weaker so far as I have lost sight of it, or have not given thanks for it. They have been accompanied by an ever deepening feeling that the danger of this age as of all previous ages—of the age in which our Lord dwelt on earth in human flesh most conspicuously—is not chiefly from those who consciously or unconsciously depart from orthodoxy; but from those who make orthodoxy an excuse for denying the Union of the Father with the Son, the perfect Manifestation of the Father in the Son; the desire of the Father and the Son by the Spirit to bring all men into the obedience of the Truth. I have therefore been found, and by God's grace I hope still to be found (when I am obliged to fight), fighting always against the popular not the unpopular men of the day. I may differ almost as widely from Mr. Jowett as from Mr. Mansel; but I join issue with Mr. Mansel, and not with Mr. Jowett, (1) because I believe he is doing a thousand times as much mischief as Mr. Jowett; (2) because the latter has won his way to the hearts of his disciples by real labours in their behalf and sympathy with them, and any attacks on him are felt as personal injuries by these, and confirm them in allegiance to what is wrong in his creed; and because the latter wins his disciples by making them content at once with their belief and with their unbelief, with their orthodox opinions and their inward Atheism. These are examples of the course which I have followed and mean to follow. Nor shall I ever take any pains not to be confounded with Mr. Jowett or any unpopular man from whom I strongly dissent. In general, they will disclaim me as a "muddy mystic." But I shall not separate myself from them except by preaching very earnestly the truths which they appear now to keep in abeyance, by always appealing to Scripture as the authority for my statements; by clinging more tenaciously than ever to the words of our creeds and prayers. I shall adopt no other method of distinguishing myself from them, lest I should lead any to suppose that I am less at war with the popular notions to which I have alluded than they are. Whereas I believe that I am more at war with these notions, just because I wish nothing omitted in the Scriptural statements of the principles to which they are attached, nothing changed in our Liturgical statements of them; because I appeal to them and no other against the distinctions and contradictions of the time. Your frankness entitled you to this frankness from me. I will gladly explain at any time any expressions of mine which you think require explanation.'

At this time other clerical journals took their cue from the Record. During the course of the controversy a stranger to my father, struck by the absence of any effort on the part of "religious" newspapers to state truthfully the actual nature of the views they were opposing, sent the following letter to my father to ask if he might, with his authority, put it forward as a correct statement.

To the Editor of the 'Clerical Journal.'

'SIR,

'August 4, 1860.

- 'Will you allow me to say in the 'Clerical Journal' that Mr. Maurice's teaching on the subject of eternal punishment has been utterly misunderstood by most of those whom I have ever heard speak on the subject from hearsay, and by many whose words I have read in newspapers and reviews?
- 'Mr. Maurice may be right in what he teaches, or he may be wrong; with the question of the truth of his doctrine I shall not here meddle at all. I presume not to be either his advocate or his opponent. I do not profess to be his disciple, but merely a careful reader of his works; and I desire now only to state what it is which Mr. Maurice does not say, which yet he is generally accused of saying; and also to state what he really does say.
- 'So far is Mr. Maurice from denying the doctrine of eternal punishment, that I have no hesitation in affirming that no man has ever more emphatically asserted the eternal and everlasting punishment and damnation of the wicked. He is continually declaring that the Lord God, merciful and gracious, will by no means clear the guilty, either in this world or in that which is to come,—that there is no possibility of escape for the wicked out of the everlasting and unquenchable fire which God has kindled and prepared for the devil and his angels. He asserts with all vehemence that if a man continues everlastingly wicked he will most certainly be everlastingly tormented.

‘What he denies is that we are plainly told in Holy Scripture, or that the English Church requires us to hold, that a wicked man must remain everlastingly a wicked man, or that death must be regarded as placing an impassable barrier against a sinner’s return from sin to righteousness, or that the victory of Eternal Love over sin is impossible unless it be gained during this mortal life.

‘Any one who has attentively read Mr. Maurice’s writings will, I think, acknowledge that the real question at issue is not whether punishment of the wicked is everlasting, but whether we have Scriptural warrant for saying that the wickedness of any man is everlasting, and after a certain time absolutely invincible by the good God,—whether deliverance from sin, and the gift of righteousness, is only possible in this world,—whether Holy Scripture anywhere lays down limits of space and time for the operation of God’s grace and redemption.

‘The first step in any controversy ought to be to know the exact question controverted. This step certainly has not been taken by very many of the loudest protestors against the doctrine supposed to be taught by Mr. Maurice.

‘I am, sir, your obedient servant,
‘E. G.’

My father’s answer was as follows :—

‘MY DEAR SIR,

‘Russell Square, W.C., August 9, 1860.

- ‘You have stated my convictions on the subject of punishment most accurately. I do, as you say, desire to assert the inseparable union of sin with misery, and the impossibility of any blessing to man till he is delivered from sin. I desire also to assert that the pure and holy will of God is always in conflict with that which is evil and rebellious in the will of the creature, and that when we pray “Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven,” we do not pray a vain prayer, but one which our Lord taught us, and which He presents with His own sacrifice to His Father.
- ‘I desire also to use the word eternal or everlasting in that sense in which I find it used in Scripture, in the creeds, and in the prayers of the Church, and in the devotions of good men, viz., as appertaining primarily and expressly to God, and therefore as distinct from and opposed to temporal.
- ‘The goodness, justice, love, truth which cannot be measured by days, months, years, centuries, I think are the eternal things; to have these is to have eternal life, to be without these is to be in death. God’s grace does raise us out of this death here; I cannot confine it by any bounds of space or time.’
- ‘P.S. I have expressed, very imperfectly, how much I am indebted to you for your kindness in trying to clear me personally of an unjust imputation, because I value so much more, and I am sure you do, any zeal for the interests of truth, than even the most gratifying tokens of individual regard. Not that I underrate them; I find them most cheering.’

Many things had changed since the Record had won its great victory over the Bishop of London in 1842–1846. In the first place, the bishop was changed. Tait had succeeded to Blomfield in 1856. In the second place, my father’s battle against what he believed to be the immoral and godless domination of anonymous religious journalism, for long an all but solitary fight, was solitary no longer. Though in scarcely a single instance those whom he had defended when in a minority and the object of attacks, had shown any disposition to be grateful to a man whose opposition to their opinions was not the less effective because it aimed at doing them justice, others who by no means shared in all his views, had keenly appreciated the moral grandeur of his position, and there was now no lack of warm personal friends to arrange for the expression of a widely extended feeling. The Record, therefore, and all its works met with a defeat so crushing that virtually from this moment it ceased to be a serious power for harm. Up to 1860 it needed some courage for a clergyman, at least one not belonging to the High Church party, to do what his conscience bade him, if the Record said one thing and his conscience another. After 1860 a man was a manifest poltroon who feared to try a fall with the defeated thing.*

It is not too much to say that the address to be now given thus served as a letter of emancipation for the clergy, for it was the direct result of the effort of the Record to exercise its old tyranny in the case of all others in which it was most anxious to exercise it. The address issued in obedience to the Record had secured in all about twenty signatures of the London clergy, no name of importance having been published among them. The counter address to my father was signed by men of every position in life, receiving 332 clerical and 487 lay signatures. The clerical included those of the Bishops of St. David's, Limerick and Labuan, seven deans, numerous canons and prebendaries, four archdeacons, other Church dignitaries, Regius professors, masters and fellows of colleges, by far the greater number of the head masters of the chief public schools, and other educational bodies of the country, with a large number of signatures from other men engaged in education, and 125

* It is a quaint indication of the change that has come over the spirit of the times that, whereas the one argument that was used to a young clergyman a few years ago was, "If you dare to say what you believe to be right and true where it differs from us, we will take care that your prospects are ruined"; now the single doubt that occurs to any one is whether it is worth while to follow to its end the history of the fall of what was once a most cruel and wrongful tyranny. I think it is.

incumbents of parishes. The lay signatures contained many representative names—Mr. Gladstone's, Mr. Alfred Tennyson's, those of men of mark in almost every position of life; peers, members of the House of Commons, barristers, physicians, men in public offices of every kind, officers in the army, people in the country, and in various provincial towns. That no effort had been made merely to collect as many names as possible, in fact that the attempt had been to restrict the list to those who personally meant what was said in it, was somewhat quaintly shown by the appearance of three ladies' names, and three only, and by the number, which might then easily have been increased, of working-men, of whom a little over a hundred in all had signed in various places. The names had of course been collected without any existing machinery. Mr. Ludlow, Mr. Davies, and Dean Hook had been throughout the prime movers. My father had, to his no small surprise, become aware of the movement whilst it was being carried on, by seeing the advertisement announcing it in the Times. The address ran thus :—

‘Friday, August, 24, 1860.

‘REVEREND AND DEAR SIR,

‘We, the undersigned members of the Church of England, clerical and lay, beg to tender to you our respectful congratulations on your recent nomination by the Crown to the Incumbency of Oxford Chapel, St. Marylebone, as a slight and tardy recognition of your eminent services, not only as one of the most learned theologians of the day, but more particularly as a wise and benevolent co-operator with the working classes of the community, upon whose minds you have been eminently successful in bringing to bear the practical truths of the Gospel, and in leading them to regard the Church of our common Lord and Master, Jesus Christ, as the great instrument designed by Providence for the regeneration of mankind and the elevation of society.

‘Some of us know from experience the mighty influence for good which you have exercised and continue to exercise on the intelligent but not always rightly directed masses of our brethren in the humbler walks of life, to whose service you have devoted the great powers of a cultivated mind and a disinterested heart.

‘What will render this address the more gratifying to you is that upon many important questions of theology we differ among ourselves, and some of us stand opposed to certain peculiarities of your own teaching ; but as we trust we are all united in our several vocations in the one object of promoting glory to God in the highest, peace upon earth and good-will towards men, we hail with satisfaction the honour done to a fellow-labourer in the great cause.’

Reply (after the presentation of the address some months later).

‘5, Russell Square, November 27, 1860.

‘MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

‘I could not thank you as heartily as I do thank you, for the cheering words you have addressed to me, if I possessed the merits for which you have given me credit.

‘I have no right to be considered a learned theologian. I am too jealous of the honour of the body to which I belong, the learning of which is so faithfully represented in the persons who have affixed their names to the address, not to shrink from such a title. I have felt the close connection between the learning of the schools and the life of the world. I have tried to save those over whom I had an influence from separating them. But I have made them aware of my deficiencies, and have urged them to seek a culture which I could not impart.

‘Neither can I assume to myself any special zeal on behalf of the labouring classes. I have endeavoured to show the few of them with whom I have been brought in contact that my office as a clergyman obliges me to care for them ; that the Bible contains a message to them which no other book contains ; that, if they receive that message, their work will become honourable, that every study in which they can engage will throw light upon their work. But I never witness the labours to which my brethren either in town or country are devoting themselves, without a feeling of shame, without perceiving that they are making sacrifices for the poor which I have not made, and are finding their way to hearts which I have not reached.

‘Least of all can I complain of the neglect from which you seem to think that I have suffered. Few persons, I believe, have been equally fortunate, even in the most ordinary sense of that word. Since I have been in Orders, I have never failed of obtaining any office which I have sought. Many favours have been bestowed upon me—that recent one which has given occasion to your kind address among them—without any solicitation at all.

‘But I accept your words with profound thankfulness to you, and to a Higher than you, as an English Churchman and as a fellow-worker. That you have thought it right as well as generous, a duty to yourselves as well as to me, publicly to acknowledge me in that character—so linking distinguished names with one which has been only rescued from insignificance by becoming specially unpopular with the organs of all the religious schools in the land—I regard as a sign, perhaps the most remarkable which our time has furnished, that the most steadfast members of the English Church prize, and are willing to seize, all occasions, even those which appear at first most unpromising, for declaring that they regard the bond of Churchmanship as an altogether different bond from that which holds the disciples of a school together, and that, with God’s help, they will not suffer one to be substituted for the other. If a few hundreds could feel it important to assert this distinction by claiming fellowship with a person like me, what tens of thousands must be awakening to the sense of it! What a divine power must be at work among us, to resist the powers which are striving to tear us asunder!

‘I am certain, my Lords and Gentlemen, that this feeling is not, as some pretend, the result of indifference to positive truths; that it does not indicate the least disloyalty in any of you to the traditions you have received from brave and godly fathers, the least carelessness about the conclusions to which you have been led by your own struggles. You want all the most earnest belief of all the schools for the service of Christ; you are sure that He can harmonise them and use them for His ends; you are sure that to lose any of them is to lose some aspect of truth, some power that may help to quicken and renovate the age. You know, from the records of history, what has happened when any sect or school has become dominant; that it has been changed from a witness for Christ into a witness for itself; that the vital convictions which were dear to its founders pass into dead notions and an unmeaning phraseology; that opposition to other schools becomes the chief token that it retains any energy of its own. Therefore you are proving your reverence for the memories of pious ancestors, your gratitude for the lessons which they have bequeathed to you, your determination that their legacies shall not be perishing heirlooms, but trusts for the generations to come, when you do what in you lies that the school, whatever it be, to which they were attached, may not lose all its power as an instrument of blessing to the Church, through a suicidal ambition to absorb the Church into itself.

‘I thank you for saying, in plain terms, that you have not signed this address because you sympathise with any opinions which I hold, or am supposed to hold, which are different from those of the majority of my countrymen. Such an assurance could not be necessary in the case of my fathers and elder brothers in the Church, whose minds have been formed under a discipline altogether different from mine, who are fit, by their wisdom and experience, to be my teachers. But it may be desirable, for the sake of younger men who have, at some risk of misinterpretation, put their names to this document, precisely because they wished to declare that they did not exclude from Christian brotherhood one with whose sentiments they greatly disagreed. There are a few, I know, among you, who have learned, or fancy they have learned, something from words which they have heard or read of mine. I am not afraid that they should suspect me of wishing any to fraternise with me on the ground of similarity in opinions. They well know that I took refuge in the Church of England, in which I had not been educated, because, as I thought, it offered me an altogether different bond of fraternity from that. A society merely united in opinion had, it seemed to me, no real cohesion; it must exalt that which a man or a multitude throweth, above the truth, or must suppose them to be identical. It will be very positive, yet it will have no permanent resting-place. It will be always changing; never growing. It will be alternately persecuting and Latitudinarian; it will be equally far from steady belief and genuine tolerance. The Church of England confesses a Father, who has revealed Himself in a Son; a Son, who took our nature and became Man, and has redeemed men to be His children; a Spirit who raises men to be spirits. She invites all to stand on that ground. She tells all—so I read her formularies—that they have no less right to claim their places in her as members of Christ than they have to claim their places in the nation as subjects of the Queen, and in their families as children of an earthly father and mother. This was a rock upon which I felt that I could rest. It was a foundation for a universal human society. If no such society existed, history seemed to me a hopeless riddle, human life very intolerable. If it did exist, it could not crush national life or family life, but must cherish and sustain both. It could stifle no thought; it must thrive when it suffered persecution, grow weak whenever it inflicted persecution. It must be ready to embrace all persons. It could never seek to comprehend any sect. It must be the great instrument of healing the strife of classes within a nation. It must proclaim Christ as the Deliverer and Head of all nations.

‘Those few friends to whom I have alluded will know that these principles are the staff of my own life, and that they are those which I have set forth in different ways for the last twenty-five years to all who have been brought in any wise under my influence. They will know that I should account them traitors to the lessons we have learnt together if they became members of a party ; or used my name as the badge of one ; or repeated my phrases ; or made use of my hints, for any other purpose than as helps to a higher knowledge and a better practice than mine. They therefore will understand me and believe me when I say, that nothing can be so satisfactory to me as to be recognised by those who care nothing for my formulas or my interpretations, but who care, more than words can express, that the Church should not lose its freedom or catholicity, should not become one of those sects which aim at its destruction, and which, as we trust, God intends it to destroy.

‘I have thought it a duty to you, my Lords and Gentlemen, not to let my gratitude mar the good which this address of yours may do to a cause which is more important to the world than all of us together. You will believe that it has cost me some effort to restrain a more enthusiastic expression of the personal delight which your words have given me. And I may say in conclusion, that, trying to look upon them as impartially as I can, I do feel that your kindness to an individual man has not enfeebled your testimony to a great principle. The less important that individual man is, the more strikingly does your consideration for him illustrate your feeling of the nature and the width of our Church fellowship. It gives him a right to wish you, in your different spheres of labour, and in your own hearts, all the blessings which that fellowship implies.’

On Sunday September 9, 1860, he “read himself in” at St. Peter’s, and preached two sermons published immediately afterwards on ‘The Faith of the Liturgy,’ and ‘The Doctrine of the Thirty-nine Articles.’

“I think,” he writes to Mr. Macmillan, “it is fair to the Bishop, to the congregation, and to those who have so kindly joined in the address to me, that I should publish them. They contain a statement of the grounds on which I accept the Prayer-book and the Articles."

At this time he was frequently engaged in going about the country to different towns where an effort was being made to set up working-men's colleges. They had been started at Oxford, Cambridge, Manchester, Salford, Ancoats, Sheffield, Halifax, Wolverhampton, Glasgow, Birkenhead, and Ayr.

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

'Proes, September 11, 1860.

'I have just returned from Wolverhampton, where we had an excellent meeting at the Working Men's College, and afterwards one of the Society of Arts, for which many of the men here got certificates. Langley and the new rector are working the thing admirably.

'And now what am I to say about the address, in which I can almost see you were a principal mover? I can only say that it was just like you to think of it; and that the words, exaggerated as they are, have been a greater comfort and encouragement to me, than I can express. I thank you for it from my heart. I only hope I may be more what you have always wished me to be, and tried to make me. I have a world of things to repent of at Lincoln's Inn. May God enable me to begin a new life.'

A short time before the breaking out of the civil war in America, the State of Maryland, fired by the passionate proslavery spirit which the excitement connected with the approaching struggle engendered in some of the southern states, passed a law, the practical effect of which was to enslave the whole free black population of the state. It happened that at the moment a considerable portion of my father's property was invested in the State funds. He was so horrified at the iniquity of the decree that he immediately had the money sold out, thereby, as it turned out, on very unbusinesslike principles, saving the whole of it from absolute loss.

To Rev. D. J. Vaughan.

‘Lilleshall, Newport, September 18, 1860.

The sermons I liked very much indeed. I am sure they are what was wanted, and that you have spoken the truth to some ears which will hear it; of course, to many which will be scandalised by it. There may be aspects of the Atonement, there must be, which you and I have not perceived; but that it is a duty to set it forth as a gospel to mankind, and not in a form which is not and cannot be a gospel, seems to me more certain every day. I have lately been preaching (at my reading in) on the Prayer-book and on the Articles. It has been a great comfort to me to feel how entirely one is speaking in the spirit of both when one is setting forth the full, perfect, sufficient sacrifice made for the sins of the whole world, and when one is not trying to reduce that sacrifice to earthly rules and measures.

I was delighted to hear that you were making way among the Unitarians at Leicester. I am well convinced that what they require is a more complete statement of the full truth of the Trinity and the Atonement; that they want no dilution of either, that it is the popular dilution of both which has outraged their consciences. The entire union of the Father with the Son is what we have to assert if we would overcome the notion of a Son who changes the Father's will. I have been taking duty for Henry de Bunsen. His father, I fear, is dying. He will be a loss to the world and a greater to his friends. His gifts never seemed to me so remarkable as his heart, which is a most wide and tender one.’

In December, 1860, difficulties arose which caused the closing of the Women's classes at the "Working Men's College." Another subject was causing trouble. The effect of the mis-statements about him made by the religious newspapers—in leading men to join him simply on the ground of his supposed tendency to criticise or to modify the Christian faith—had made it a serious danger lest the College should be used for a purpose the exact opposite of that which he and his friends desired. His resolute determination not to excommunicate, his unwillingness to judge, his belief in the recognition of the voice of conscience by any man as a recognition of the presence and personal government of Christ, his sense that it was not for him to dictate the mode in which expression should be given in words to that recognition, and his dread of forming a party, if he once began to draw a line and to refuse those who were willing to follow the example of the great Sacrifice by making sacrifices themselves—all these feelings made such a situation peculiarly difficult for him, and continually led him to look upon resignation as the only resource open to him.

The letter to Mr. Hughes which follows, will set forth his views. It is necessary, however, to remember always that which he never points out—that the difficulties in the way of this kind of Christian influence were in no way the result of the failure of the principles he advocated, but always the direct result of the misrepresentations and of the readiness of mankind to greedily devour second-hand gossip. He himself does not point this out in this letter or elsewhere, because he always looked upon it as his first duty to judge himself and to accuse himself of whatever went wrong.

To Mr. Hughes.

‘5 Russell Square, W.C., January 3, 1861.

‘I see with much satisfaction that Harrison’s name does not appear in the new programme. Is that in consequence of any representations of yours? Still this omission does by no means meet the evil of which we were speaking the other day. I feel that I ought to make some frank and full statement of the principles which at all events govern my own mind in all thoughts and plans for education, and for the working-men. I wish it to be clearly understood that I do not plead for a modified Christianity, for one less strong and definite than that which is held by the extremest section of the Recordite School; that I find fault with their Christianity only because it seems to me to have nothing to do with Christ, to be a mere religious system constructed by human speculation, made up of crude philosophical notions and popular superstitions, and alien from that revelation of the living and true God which I find set forth in Scripture. I hold that for the reformation of the age, most especially for the elevation of the working classes, we want a firmer, fuller, more loving theology, such a theology as I find in the creeds of the Church. If that is vigorously set forth, I care not how many Records, Guardians, Essays and Reviews, Saturday Reviews, Westminster Reviews, set forth their theories, with how much scorn and bitterness any of them are mingled. All are necessary for the development and manifestation of the truth. Come one, come all, the truth if it can be spoken out will be too strong for them. It is only that which is not truth that trembles, at one statement or another, at one contradiction or another. But if we speak, as I have done, only in muttered accents, in cowardly whispers, our position must be mistaken. It must be supposed that we do not mean what we profess to mean, but are uttering lies in church, and modifying them as much as we can in the world. That Records and Westminster Reviews should hold one to be a mixture of rascal and fool selling one's soul for a bit of bread, is a thing of course; one ought not to be the least disturbed about that. But that the people, especially the people of our own College, should be in doubt about our sincerity is more serious, for their own sake, not ours. This, therefore, I think we should earnestly labour to prevent.'

The next letter is in answer to one published in Miss Wynn's 'Memorials,' p. 279, referring to a sermon on the collect for the fourth Sunday in Advent.

To Miss Williams Wynn.

‘January 4, 1861.

‘I am much delighted that the sermon met your difficulties. I find more and more how much we lose, either by taking up with the merely scholastical idea of satisfaction, or by simply throwing that aside as hard and ungenial, without seeking for the truth which is involved in it. The violence with which some are casting off all belief in mediation and intercession, because the popular representations of them are so bewildered, and often so inconsistent with the righteousness and truth of God, shocks, though it does not surprise me. I should suppose that every false conception is corrected and cured only by the principle which it contrasts and caricatures, never by a denial.’

During the year 1860 had been published the volume of ‘Essays and Reviews.’ It had attracted very little attention till an article appeared in the ‘Westminster Review’ in October 1860 entitled “Neo-Christianity,” claiming the book as evidence of the adhesion to the “Westminster’s” views of a body of clergy. The greatest excitement was immediately produced. Scenes followed, which had at all events the unfortunate appearance of being more due, to the anxiety of individual clergymen not to be associated with men for the moment unpopular, than to any very earnest faith.

The “Episcopal movements about the ‘Essays and Reviews’” have been recently very fully described in Bishop Wilberforce’s ‘Life.’ The article in the ‘Quarterly Review’ of January 1861 was written by Bishop Wilberforce.

To the Rev. A. P. Stanley.

‘5 Russell Square, W.C., February 12, 1861.

‘MY DEAR STANLEY,

‘I am greatly distressed at the Episcopal movement about the ‘Essays and Reviews.’ As my only hope of resisting the devil worship of the religious world lies in preaching the full revelation of God in Christ set forth in the Bible, I cannot have much sympathy with the book generally. But I look upon the efforts to suppress it as mere struggles to keep off the question, "What dost thou believe? dost thou believe in anything?" which must be forced upon each of us, the bishops included. The orthodoxy which covers our Atheism must be broken through, and whether it is done by the 'Essays and Reviews' or in any other way, seems to me a matter of indifference, though it is not a matter of indifference whether the Church shall be committed to a new persecution which must make the new reformation, when it comes, more complicated and terrible. I never have any conversation with Trench on any serious topic, and do not the least know what he thinks about things in heaven or earth. He seems to me an alarmist like the rest. If the Bishop of Oxford did write the article in the 'Quarterly' it seems to me very shocking, first, that he should attack his own clergy anonymously; and second, that he should utter vulgar jokes about Bunsen, whom he knew, and for whom he professed esteem.'

To the Bishop of Argyll (Dr. Ewing).

'5 Russell Square, February 28, 1861.

The Charge which you were so very kind as to send me delighted me more than I can express. I did not know at first where to send you my thanks for it, afterwards I was ashamed at having delayed to do so for so long. It seemed to me just what one longed to hear for the sake of Scotland and of England too.

I shall feel very much honoured indeed if you would occupy my pulpit any time during your stay in London, and plead in it the cause of your diocese. I have as yet had no collections. I suppose I ought to begin with our dispensary and one or two local charities. After that if you will kindly appear in the morning (for the congregation is very much larger then), you will be welcomed, I am sure, by the people as well as the minister.

‘Thank you very much for allowing me to see dear Mr. Erskine’s letters. They are like everything he writes and speaks—full of life, love and instruction. All that he says of sacrifice as the antagonist principle and power to selfishness I inwardly recognise as true and most Scriptural. But I think the only begotten Son, the Head of the race, has by His sacrifice redeemed us out of the power of the devil, the spirit of selfishness, and that this redemption is the necessary groundwork for that operation of the Spirit of love and sacrifice on our hearts to raise us above the power of that enemy. It is in this way that the old doctrine of the Church of a baptism into the name of the Father, the Son, the Spirit, the one God blessed for ever, appears to me to comprehend what he and Mr. Campbell say, and to be a gospel to mankind, which their teaching, though most purifying and elevating to the individual, scarcely can be. But I am not the less grateful to them for bringing forth a side of truth which is so set at nought, and the neglect of which involves the dark and terrible notion that Christ’s sacrifice redeems us from the power of His Father, not from the power of the enemy and destroyer.

‘I feel, as Mr. Erskine does, how hopeless it is to extract any theology or humanity from the ‘Essays and Reviews.’ But I cannot think that the fears which are expressed of them betoken much confidence in the Bible or in God. One can only hope that the discussion may lead us to seek a deeper foundation than the essayists or their opponents appear to deem necessary.

‘With many thanks for your remembrance of me.’

To Mr. Hughes.

‘3 Queen Square, Bath, March 9, 1861.

‘I send you a note of Clark’s which I think you should consider and show to Davies, Ludlow and Stanley. What I think might be desirable would be a statement of reasons for not joining in the address to the Archbishop,* which I see was to be presented some day this week, or is to be presented some day next week. I do not say that these reasons need appear at once or that they need be unanimous. Different persons may see different objections to that proceeding, and may state them differently. It might be considered whether they could or could not be put forward together. My own reasons would involve a statement of this kind: (1) Accepting the Trinity in Unity as the foundation of a Universal Church, I find from ecclesiastical history that every attempt to put down some heresy which interferes with the full acknowledgment of that truth has begotten some other heresy which equally interferes with the full acknowledgment of it. (2) That I therefore discern in this history a clear and direct sentence of God upon all attempts to restrain the expression of thought and belief, even if that expression takes ever so negative and contradictory form, because by restraining it, I only introduce another negative and contradiction. (3) That I therefore base toleration not upon the uncertainty of truth, but upon its certainty; not upon the absence of a revelation of it, but upon the existence of revelation, and upon the promise that the Spirit of Truth shall guide us into the perception of it. (4) That the English Church from various circumstances of its position, from its possession of creeds, from its repudiation of any infallible mortal guides, from its national unsectarian character, is specially bound to assert this ground, and that the conscience of the nation, in spite of the prejudices of Statesmen and Churchmen, has asserted it and does assert it. (5) That the full recognition of diversity of opinion in this sense is necessary to the safety of the truth and of the Church, and that all supposed necessity of vindicating our formularies from the attacks of those who have subscribed to them (or as the Saturday Review puts it, of vindicating the property of a corporation to those who accept the terms on which it is established) must in the minds of devout and earnest people be subordinate to this. (6) That if we take this course we shall acknowledge the Bible, in a more full sense than we have ever done, as a message from God to human beings; not being embarrassed by the various interpretations of it, each of which is in itself narrow and partial, each of which may contribute something in God's hands to the elucidation of its full purpose. (7) That the great fault of the 'Essays and Reviews' is, in the judgment of most men, their heretical tendency; that is to say, their inclination to set up some special individual opinion against the faith of mankind. Supposing the charge is true, to whatever extent it is true, those who oppose them must vindicate their own faith, by showing that they do not wish to set up separate opinions; that they do confess a faith for mankind, and that this cannot be done by trying to suppress or crush any special opinion. (8) That the unbelief of the time—which is more deep, more widely spread, than those who complain of the 'Essays and Reviews' have any notion, but which is not hopeless, because God lives and is mightier than man or devil—has its roots in the notion that there is not a common faith for mankind, and that all that Churchmen and believers in the Bible can do is, if they have power, to silence each other."

* Against 'Essays and Reviews.'

Soon afterwards it was agreed that the friends should publish a series of pamphlets under the old title of 'Tracts for Priests and People,' a title which he had had in his mind, almost from the date of Mr. Daniel Macmillan's first acquaintance with him. Mr. Ludlow sent him the following paper as a proposed statement of the design of the tracts.

"It is proposed that a set of papers be issued bearing on the religious questions treated of in 'Essays and Reviews,' but considered from a strictly positive point of view. Apart from any particular errors the teaching of that volume is essentially negative. If it is to be met at all it must be by a distinct and steadfast assertion of the truths which are there, to some extent, ignored. Till now the volume has been met only by denials and denunciations. Upon a mere denial of a negation nothing whatever can be built. The writers of the proposed series will be all members of the Church of England, not mere attendants at her services, but men who, from very different starting-points, have been led to feel that her ritual is the truest embodiment of our national worship. They hold the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity to express profound relations existing in the Divine nature and manifested in creation, and the fact of the incarnation of the second person of that Trinity in our Lord Jesus Christ to be at once the key to human history, the great support of personal religion, and the foundation of national life. Looking at the Bible as the authoritative and inspired exponent of that fact, they wish to assert strongly its right to be treated, not in the bondage of the letter, but in the freedom of the spirit, with that perfect love which casteth out all fear. United on these grounds, which they believe to be deeper than all opinions, the writers wish distinctly to state that they differ from each other on many points, nor will they seek to conceal their differences, each being so far responsible for the others, that they believe the cause of truth will best be served by the hearing of all. For they are one and all convinced that nothing is so likely to check the spread of a hearty Christian spirit amongst the educated, and still more the half-educated classes of English society, as any semblance of a disposition to shrink from free inquiry into God's truth. The writers will comprise both clergymen and laymen; the papers will go forth signed or unsigned at the choice of the writer."

His answer was as follows :—

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

'MY DEAR FRIEND, 'Queen Square, Bath, March 15, 1861.

'Your statement of the design of the tracts appears to me, in its principle, excellent. The denial of negations is the great danger to avoid.

'How hard to avoid it this very sentence proves. But I am afraid I must be negative too when I come to details.

'My objections to the mode in which you present your principle have reference (1) to ourselves, (2) to the English public, (3) to the writers of the essays and reviews.

'(1) Your language respecting the doctrine of the Trinity that it "expresses certain profound relations in the Divine nature" is perhaps as skilfully chosen as any language could be to describe a certain contemplative belief of ours abstracta. If I could put my thoughts about my own opinion about the Trinity into a phrase I could not find any that I should like much better. But it is precisely this which I feel myself unable to do. The name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost, is for me the name of the God in whom I am living and moving, and having my being. It is the name into which I baptize little children, which is about them as they grow up into men, which is to reveal itself to them in all their conflicts and hopes, their sorrows and joys, which their doubts and their infidelity, like their faith, are instruments in making known to them. So I have felt it to be myself, having been brought up a Unitarian, and having learnt by every fresh experience that in the fullest and best sense of the word I can be nothing else than a Unitarian,—the pursuit of unity being the end which God has set before me from my cradle upwards, the confession of Unity as infinite, embracing, sustaining, being the confession which I make in the Creed that I have accepted in my mature years. I cannot ask any one else to understand this experience or force the utterance of the results of it upon any. But I do perceive that if I have any work in the world it is to bear witness of this Name, not as expressing certain relations, however profound, in the Divine nature, but as the underground of all fellowship among men and angels, as that which will at last bind all into one, satisfying all the craving of the reason as well as of the heart, meeting the desires and intuitions that are scattered through all the religions of the world. A phrase like that of yours, it seems to me, might be a fine scholastical meeting-point for men who were content to sink their strongest convictions upon the subject of which they were speaking, for the sake of a compromise, but would only mislead our readers respecting the object which we all have at heart. (2) I agree with you entirely that all the answers to the ‘Essays and Reviews’ have been as negative as themselves or more negative than they are. But I am afraid the announcement will look rather like a boast on our parts that we are going to strike out some wonderful new line of thought and confutation than, as what you mean it to be, our acknowledgment that we share in the common faith, and that we desire to say why it is dear to us. I think the occurrence of the meeting at the Archbishop’s ought to be our starting-point. We should say that an excitement, which according to Bishop P—— amounts to a shriek, among 6000 clergymen evidently indicates a state of anxiety and doubt, which, whatever has caused it, cannot in itself be healthy, which nevertheless may lead to the greatest good if it stirs us to ask what are the grounds of our faith, if it awakens us, as the teaching of that school whereof the Archbishop is a member awakened our forefathers, out of a slumber of comfortable orthodoxy to seek for a living God. I think we should express our joy and satisfaction at the Archbishop’s announcement that there is little chance of crushing the essayists by an appeal to the Ecclesiastical Courts, because we are sure that all such efforts at suppression and persecution have led, and must lead, to increased insecurity in the clergy, and more unbelief in the laity. I think we should respond to his call by saying that though we are not competent to prove our brethren and our superiors feeble and foolish, as his Grace thinks the clergy will be able to prove the essayists and reviewers if they try, we are able to declare the reasons of the hope that is in us, and with God’s help we will endeavour to do so. (3) I have read the essays carefully since I have been here, and I believe we owe them more than your words seem to admit. I should say of every one, “The writer does not mean to be negative, does not mean to overthrow the faith. He is confused by what he sees around him and feels within him. He has stated his confusions frankly, or has tried to do so." If those confusions are taken as any settlement of questions, as any substitute for that which is believed in Christendom at the present day, if any human being is content to rest in these confusions, the effect must be mischievous. But the acknowledgment of them may not in the end prove mischievous. It has of course two issues: thorough infidelity, or a deeper faith. If we shrink from that issue, if we are afraid to try it, we decide for the first alternative. We have ceased to believe in God. We have denied the assertions and promises of the Bible. These are the thoughts which have occurred to me about your paper, for which, however, I thank you heartily, and which with all this movement, will, I trust, tend to bring us all much more closely together. If we can, let us write together; if not, let us at least think, speak, pray together.'

* See Burke’s essay on the Sublime and Beautiful.

To the Bishop of Argyll.

'Russell Square, Monday, Lady Day, 1861.

- 'I had hoped to return Mr. Erskine's letter to you in person at Clapham. I have been very wrong to detain it so long.
- 'His testimony respecting 'Essays and Reviews' is of much worth. I feel with him that their deficiencies are more serious than their utterances. But is not their unbelief the unbelief of us all? Is it less remarkable in the Quarterly Reviewer who denounces them than in themselves? He wishes us to hold certain positions about God, but where is the God acting, speaking, ruling, whom the Scriptures set before us?
- 'The answer of the 'Quarterly Review' to what Rowland Williams says about the good works of our Lord, involves, it seems to me, the most fatal denial of His revelation of the Father, of His answer to the Jews when they charged him with casting out devils by the prince of the devils. If He does not come to manifest goodness in His acts, if their power is their principal characteristic, what becomes of the difference between His miracles and those which we are told alike in the Old and New Testament not to believe, though the apparent evidence for them is ever so great? How fearful are these denials of denials! How needful is it that we should search everywhere for that which is not denial, for the faith which is hidden under ever so much apparent contradiction, if we would not confirm and spread unbelief! I am frightened more than I can express at the temper of those who are busy in the condemnation of their brethren and are not busy in the discovery and confession of their own heresies and sins.

‘I hope you will forgive me for speaking out my own thoughts so freely. Your kindness has encouraged me to do so. And I am partly bound to take that course, because in my last note I seemed to find fault with Erskine, at whose feet I ought always to sit and learn. I hope I said nothing of him which is inconsistent with that posture. I only wished to say what I felt that I had need of, which he did not show me.’

Among the papers for the series of ‘Tracts for Priests and People,’ one was sent them * which he was by no means ready to accept without comment. He proposed to let it go forth as it was, but to add certain remarks “by another clergyman.” The next letter turns on this subject.

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

‘May 23, 1861.

‘I do as I would be done by. I should like everything I write to be criticised in like manner, and to appear with the criticisms unanswered, unless what I have said answers them. Nothing you have said alters my opinion that we can do the world most good by setting forth our beliefs in our different modes, by fairly exposing the difference and the conflict of those modes, and by expressing or manifesting our conviction that they are reconciled in a Truth of which we have a strong and vital, though an imperfect perception. This is my idea of criticism, and of what you and Paul name compromise. Criticism, it seems to me, will be always negative, cruel, Saturday Reviewish, unless it becomes an interchange of thoughts between men who care much for each other and more for Truth. Compromise must always tend to the impairing of moral vigour, and to the perplexing of the conscience, if it is anything else than a confession of the completeness of Truth, and of the incompleteness of our apprehension of it. I accept the Articles as a witness of truths which I cannot comprehend in my little system, and which my neighbour cannot comprehend in his little system. But God forbid that I should accept them if they compel me to give up any portion of that which I believe to him, or him to give up any portion of that which he believes to me. These are the compromises of politicians, which have no place in the Kingdom of God, seeing that they are based on calculations of self interest and fear, not on mutual sacrifice.

* By Rev. C. K. Paul.

‘I am tender of all men’s convictions, therefore I am tender of that stern conviction of the English mind which is expressed in denunciations of compromise; there is, I admit, as much tendency to evil, as much possibility of evil in that conviction as in every other. That is my reason for insisting that it shall be respected by those who especially dread this evil; else it will become predominant. Never to tread on the toes of schoolmen because they are apt to be gouty, though they have all comfortable flannels to put them in, and to tread ruthlessly on the toes of people who are walking shoeless and stockingless among the dust and stones, and whose toes moreover are far better for walking and kicking than those of any schoolmen, is for me a huge contradiction. The old woman of the schools bears to see truth cut in pieces and calls it compromise, because she never travailed for it. The cry, “no cutting, no compromise” may be rude and inequitable; but it is the cry of the mother over her own child. I shall not enter into any fresh argument about the Athanasian Creed. It has been given to us of the West, and I believe it has helped to keep us, (1) in the feeling that the Trinity embraces us, and that we cannot embrace the Trinity; (2) in a dread of Tritheism; (3) in an imperfect assurance that eternal life must be more than the possession of certain rewards by certain individuals in a future state, that everlasting damnation must be something more than the infliction of certain punishments on certain individuals in a future state by the God of Truth and Love. And because the opinion has been more and more growing among religious men that eternal life is the possession of certain rewards by certain individuals in a future state, and eternal damnation the punishment of certain individuals for ever and ever in a future state by a decree of God; therefore the Creed has become every day more of a burden, more of a contradiction. You think that to avoid the contradiction it must be surrendered to those religious people who like to curse their brethren a little, but not so strongly as this Creed, according to their use of it, curses these brethren. If God so orders it, let the Creed go. But my work is to protest against the current opinion, and to use the old Creed for the worrying and torment of those who hold it. I would rather be cursed by the man who finds his salvation in believing in God the Father, in the only begotten Son, who is One with the Father and took our flesh, in the Spirit, who proceedeth from the Father and the Son and in whose Unity the Father and the Son dwell for ever, than be blessed by the man who regards either the Trinity or the Unity as a mere opinion standing aloof from him and me. I know that the one must mean me good whatever his language is, I know that the other must hold me as an alien even if he expresses ever so much toleration for me.’

To a Lady.

‘Russell Square, W.C., August 3, 1861.

‘If I did not believe that you and I and all people whatsoever have actually been redeemed by the sacrifice of the eternal Son of God, and that in His flesh and blood there is a new and living way consecrated for us into the presence of God, I would not urge you to frequent the Communion table. Because I do believe this and am sure that such a redemption goes beneath all thoughts, dreams, apprehensions, and that we only approach God because He has drawn us to Him, therefore I say, "No thought about our feelings or qualifications, the amount of our faith, the consistency of our lives, the sincerity of our repentance, ought to keep us back." We go to confess the want of feelings and qualifications, the inconsistency of our lives and the insincerity of our repentance; we go to ask that God will give us what we have need of out of His fulness. But above all we want the witness and pledge of a common salvation, of a God who cares for all in Christ as much as for us. We want the plainest testimonies, those that are least dependent upon our temperament or state of mind, that He is the same yesterday and to-day and for ever. The Sacrifice is His; He gives up His Son for us all. The Son went with the Father fulfilling His will. We can but come, recollecting that perfect Sacrifice, giving God thanks that He is perfectly satisfied with us in His Son, asking to have the Spirit of Sacrifice, and that that Spirit, who is within us convincing us of righteousness, of judgment, may dwell in us and quicken us to all the good works which God has prepared for us to walk in. You will be tormented, as all are in this day, with thoughts about the meaning and extent and necessity of Christ's sacrifice. The more you connect it with Communion, the more you interpret its meaning, its extent, its necessity, by the fellowship it establishes between you and God, between you and your brother, by the only not infinite resistance which there is to that fellowship in yourself and in your brother—the more will you overcome these difficulties practically if not theoretically; and the practical conquest of this is what we need, the other will come so far as we require it. The very words which indicate the Lord's Supper, "Eucharist" and "Communion," are explanatory of the whole Gospel, of our necessities, of the way in which God has satisfied them.'

The 'Travels and Adventures of the Rev. Joseph Wolff, D.D., LL.D.,' the famous Jew missionary, had just appeared, and he writes of them.

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

'Redmarley, Newent, August 15, 1861.

'I feel more and more that till there is some middle point found between the Jewish mind as exhibited in its rudest, crudest, shape by Wolff, and the Western mind as exhibited in the rudest, crudest shape by any modern newspaper, the Bible will be a sealed book to us. It is not that we cannot understand the Prophets. I was saying this morning to Mrs. Maurice what measure is there between the intelligibility of Isaiah and that of Lord Mahon's 'Life of Pitt,' which we happen to be reading, looking upon both as political treatises. The language of one is all luminous, the other muddy beyond expression, though most respectable and quite as good as most biographies of the kind. And yet we cannot make out Isaiah, and Lord Mahon appears to cause us no trouble. That is not owing to the distance of the times. Isaiah often seems to be written for the reign of Louis Napoleon, and Pitt's age to be separated from ours by an infinite chasm. Take the words, "I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me." "Nonsense," say all the preachers, "these English people are not God's children in any sense. How can they know their owner or their master's crib? They have no owner and no crib till we have been and converted them." And so Wolff says rightly enough, "You give up Isaiah and the prophets to us—your doctrine is different from theirs, and all attempts to accommodate them to your doctrine must prove futile." Here is the ground for Jowett's doctrine about modern thought. Here is the ground for the utter weariness and hopelessness about the Scriptures which we see everywhere—so let us gird up our loins to think about this and what the remedy must be. I am sure it is not to run violently counter to the belief of our time; but to strengthen that, so far as we can, against the tremendous unbelief which mingles with it in all our minds. I come more and more back to the feeling that sound political teaching is what we want to restore sense and might to our Bible studies.'

'Redmarley, Newent, September 13, 1861.

'MY DEAR STRACHEY,

' . . . I have a copy of Mill's book kindly sent me by himself. But I have not yet read it, being over head and ears in moral philosophy. I anticipate much pleasure and profit from all his teachings on representation, though I scarcely should expect to hear much from him about prophecy to which I could attach a meaning. He seems to me to have the completest interpretation of the universe without God, and prophecy to consist in the interpretation of it as altogether God's, and illuminated by His presence; so that at what point they meet I find it hard to conjecture. But I have no doubt I shall discover when I am able to study the book. . . .'

To a Son (an undergraduate at Oxford).

'5 Russell Square, October 23, 1861.

' . . . Tell me what are your little-go subjects. I shall like to read them over by myself and write to you about them. I have not forgotten Homer,' [i.e., a series of letters which he had already written about Homer] 'and will take him up again, if you have any questions you like to ask, at any part you would wish me to begin; but I would rather speak of what is occupying you now; and there is no Greek play and no Roman history which may not be connected with what is passing around us. There is no help I can give you so great as that of pointing out to you how what you read refers to what you do and to what others are doing about you. Every article in the Times speaks to me of some of the principles which I did find or should have found in my studies at Oxford. You will know what I mean some day I hope. And do not think that the minute grammatical study of books makes them less practical or less interesting. The more really you understand the speech as well as the thoughts of writers the more you will find that they explain your speech and your thoughts, the more perplexities that entangle you in your practice will be cleared away. And while in this way studies illustrate our life, they also illustrate each other. We find how they hang together. And we find which is most important, as being most practical and as most interpreting the rest.

‘Do you remember what Charles Lamb says about his wanting a grace before Shakespeare and Milton as well as a grace before meat? I am sure this is true, if our books are not to choke us. Think of it, will you?’

CHAPTER XII.

"Whereof what better witnes can ye expect I should produce then one of your own now sitting in Parliament, the chief of learned men reputed in this Land, Mr. Selden, whose volume of naturall and national laws proves, not only by great authorities brought together, but by exquisite reasons and theorems almost mathematically demonstrative, that all opinions, yea errors known, read, and collated, are of main service and assistance toward the speedy attainment of what is truest.—Milton's Speech in behalf of the liberty of unlicenced Printing."

DR. LUSHINGTON'S JUDGMENT ON HEATH—THE REFUSAL TO PAY MR. JOWETT HIS SALARY—VALUE OF THE ARTICLES AS PLEDGES OF LIBERTY—CONTINUATION OF 'TRACTS FOR PRIESTS AND PEOPLE'—THE INSPIRATION OF ST. PAUL—PUBLICATION OF LAST PART OF 'MORAL AND METAPHYSICAL PHILOSOPHY'—THE PERSONALITY OF THE DEVIL—MRS. OLIPHANT'S 'LIFE OF EDWARD IRVING'—CARLYLE AND IRVING—AN IMPORTANT PIECE OF AUTOBIOGRAPHY IN CONNECTION WITH IRVING—MR. JOWETT ON LEGENDS—TWO LETTERS ON THE ATHANASIAN CREED—ON THE CALLINGS OF MEN.

AN eccentric clergyman, Mr. Heath, had published a series of sermons containing propositions from which my father dissented very strongly. Amongst other things, he had said, what was in itself indisputable, that "the immortality of the soul" is a phrase not to be found in the Bible. He had from that argued that the idea was unscriptural. All his views were of a very unpopular kind. The clergy of the Isle of Wight had petitioned the Bishop to prosecute him. The Bishop had yielded. Dr. Lushington, towards the end of 1861, had given a decision on the case which, as my father afterwards put it, appeared "to condemn (1) all who acknowledge our baptismal service, and believe that infants without conscious faith are accepted by God; (2) all strong Calvinists who think that Christ died for the elect, and not for mankind." The judgment was so worded that, if it was sustained, much that my father taught would be condemned also.

'I have always taught,' he writes, 'and by God's help always mean to teach, that we are accepted by God in Christ the Head of all men; that our faith is grounded upon what He is, and what He has done, and is in no sense the cause of our acceptance; and that this faith is in a redeemer, not in any tenet about particular redemption or general redemption. This doctrine may be condemned by Dr. Lushington's reading of the 11th Article. I fear it is. I cannot help that. I must preach this Gospel or none.'

Practically it was never doubtful that the terms of the judgment would be reversed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, as they in fact subsequently were. The decision at the moment led to a notice in the Spectator complaining of the Thirty-Nine Articles as the causes of the difficulty. To this my father replied in a letter to the editor of 'Macmillan's Magazine' in December 1861. He maintained that the fact of the Articles having been composed in the sixteenth century was far from being a reason for changing them to suit the tastes of the nineteenth; that the temper and spirit of the sixteenth century were much more suited for the work of making permanent laws than the spirit of the nineteenth as shown in these prosecutions. "I find the construction which nineteenth-century wisdom puts upon the Articles exceedingly hard and narrow, utterly inconsistent, it seems to me, with the theology of the fathers or of the reformers of the Creeds, and of our prayers. I find each nineteenth-century sect and school ready to spring at the throat of every other. I find divines and prelates of the nineteenth century ready, or at least submitting, to accomplish the wishes of these sects, and of the journals that represent them. 'Reculer pour mieux sauter' is, I hold, the maxim of all true reformation. I know of none which has not appealed to the past against the present, and which has not thus won blessings for the future."

About the same time a question had come on for solution which was not settled for several years. Mr. Jowett, as Regius Professor of Greek at Oxford, had been devoting so much knowledge and care to the teaching of his classes that all tutors in the University, whatever their views and opinions might be, had found it necessary to advise those undergraduates who hoped to do well in the final schools to attend Mr. Jowett's classes.

A merely nominal salary (£40 a year) had been originally attached to each of the Regius Professorships. All the rest of the Regius Professorships had been either augmented by other means, or had had special stipends added to them by grants from the University. When, however, the question of Mr. Jowett's salary was brought before the Senate, the country clergy flocked to Oxford in order to refuse to a man, whose opinions they held to be mischievous, payment for work admirably done, with which those opinions were in no way connected.

My father burnt with indignation. Here was just what he meant by the confusion between truth and opinion. Differing from Mr. Jowett as widely as any of the voters, he held that the question was virtually whether it is right or wrong to deprive a man of that to which he is rightfully entitled because you look upon his opinions as mistaken. For the moment his conclusions on Dr. Lushington's decision, the mob law of the Oxford Senate, and the Spectator on the Thirty-Nine Articles, were summed up in the following sentence of a letter to Mr. Hutton.

To Mr. Hutton.

'Queen's College, November 29, 1861.

'I am more strong, than ever on the side of fixed laws, since I see the determination of mobs as well as bishops and doctors to stretch prerogative, and I cannot the least agree with you in thinking that the deepest principles of theology had not much more hold on men's minds, and were not grasped more firmly and therefore with less frivolous irritation (earnest passion I do not speak of) against opponents in the sixteenth century than in the nineteenth. It seems to me that if we cared for an organic body of articles we could not raise these questions about specific articles.' [i. e., about the turn of a phrase in the wording of one of the Articles.]

The following letter was written to suggest to Mr. Hughes the subject of a tract never published.

To Mr. Hughes.

‘January 17, 1862.

‘What do you think of saying something of Williams's tract. I will suggest three points for your consideration: (1) There is a distinct revolting in the minds of simple Englishmen against Williams's statements, specially against that one which seems to put Homer and Shakespeare on the level of Isaiah and St. Paul. But those who attack Williams are cutting the ground from under their feet. They use the conscience and yet protest against it. They say we have no faculty for discerning between what is true and false in Divine things; yet they try to turn it to account in a prosecution. And they deaden the feeling by the prosecution. They awaken a certain one in favour of the defendant. (2) This doctrine of Williams's about a similar inspiration in Shakespeare and the writers of the New Testament, scandalises us just because it glorifies intellect and genius at the expense of that which is common and universal. If he had said the humblest men, not only Homer or Shakespeare, receive that self-same Spirit wherewith St. Paul was baptized, he would have said just what St. Paul has said himself. If he had said all gifts proceed from the Spirit, he would have said what St. Paul has said, and would have justified himself to the hearts and to the conscience of all who do not boast of their own gifts. (3) Phillimore and Coleridge, in denying this, have gone near to establish the most tremendous heresies, compared with which all in the Essays would have been deemed mild and moderate by Athanasius, Augustine, even by John Wesley. They have almost denied that we do receive the self-same Spirit which the Apostles received, that we are to own Him in all our acts and thoughts. (4) Moral—This is the effect of all prosecutions, to endorse denials; to extinguish no heresy; to introduce the most flagrant. If this was stated in your broad way with a little sprinkling of legal lore it might do much good.'

After nearly a lifetime of labour his 'Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy' was at last finished. It had been published at the end of 1861.

To Mr. Hutton.

'5 Russell Square, April 19, 1862.

'I am much cheered and consoled by what you say of my 'Moral Philosophy,' though I am very sorry you should have had such an opportunity of reading it as bed has afforded you. If you should have an opportunity hereafter, will you mention that it is not, as the Athenæum has said, a reprint; that there is not one word the same as the original very meagre article in the 'Encyclopædia' and that I have been some years about it?'

To Rev. E. Philips.

'The Athenæum, April 20, 1862.

'I am afraid I shall never succeed in persuading you that I mean what I say, and have not some esoteric doctrine which I wish to hide. I do not talk about the personality of the devil or the spirits of whom I read in the New Testament, because I do not find the writers of the New Testament talking about it, and because I believe I should convey a very confused impression to my hearers if I did. They might fancy that by personality I intend some bodily form, of which I hear nothing and know nothing; though if I did hear or know anything, the hearing or the knowledge would give me no trouble and no satisfaction. A spirit and only a spirit is to me personal. I do not call a frog or a flea a person, for it is not spiritual. Whenever I am told of a spirit, evil or good, I at once assume that that is like me, can hold converse with me, can tempt me to wrong, can encourage me to right. The Holy Spirit is the inspirer, as I believe, of all the energies by which my personal life manifests itself. He gives me the sense that I am a person; how can He be impersonal? The evil spirit speaks to me as a person, tempts me to think that I am not a person, tries to reduce me into a thing. I never should dream of calling him a thing. What then do you require of me? I believe in nations not in nationalities, in persons not in personalities. I avoid these popular newspaper phrases, not because I covet abstractions, but because I hate them. Mr. Hall, the Baptist preacher, was once accosted by one of his confrères: "Sir, do not you believe in the devil?" "No, sir," he answered; "I believe in God. Do not you?" Now he had an intense feeling of the devil as his personal and constant enemy; but he kept his belief for his everlasting friend.'

Mrs. Oliphant had recently published her 'Life of Edward Irving.' Mr. Ludlow was proposing to review the book.

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

'5 Russell Square, W.C., May 28, 1862.

'All I have heard and known of Mrs. Oliphant is most favourable. Carlyle, who knew Irving well, and the best part of whose mind and heart comes out in speaking of him, likes the book on the whole very much, saying it is the most loyal biography he has read for a long time.

'I have not yet read it. But the part about Scott has apparently pained his friends and himself beyond expression. . . . I believe Irving to have been the man who felt most deeply and inwardly the truth of the old Puritan theocracy, and who laboured most, under the most difficult circumstances, that he might pass into the acknowledgment of a universal kingdom of God, not sink it in an atheistical democracy. Neither Scott, Erskine, nor Campbell, admirable men as they are, seem to me to have entered into the political worth of his testimony, or therefore to have understood him.'

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

'May 30, 1862.

'There have been times when I have accepted your judgment of Carlyle, and have added to it some bitterness of my own, arising out of the disappointment that a man who has taught me so much should outrage some of my strongest convictions. Last week I renewed my intercourse with him, which for various reasons, partly accidental, has been interrupted. I went to his house with much reluctance and some fear. After a long conversation with him, I came away with a strong conviction, that very much more is expressed in that oscillation of his mind between democracy and absolutism, to which the Spectator alluded in its criticism on his 'Frederick,' than this reviewer, or than you, are willing to admit. Ever since his 'Cromwell,' indeed long before, I have always been persuaded that a profound theocratic belief was really at the basis of his mind; that in the French Revolution he heard the voice of God speaking to the kings of the earth; and that losing it among the cries of democracy, he sought for it again in the believing rulers of the seventeenth century; that not willing to suppose it utterly silent at any time, he listened for it and thought he discovered it in the stern decrees and the war with cant of the unbelieving rulers of the eighteenth. There are terrible contradictions in his thoughts, which express themselves in his wild speech. But the contradictions belong to the time: we may find them in ourselves. And they cannot be resolved, as you fancy they may, into the mere worship of might. That comes uppermost at times; often he recoils from it with the intensest horror, and affirms and feels Justice to be the one ruler in heaven and earth. The infinite wail for a real and not a nominal father, for a real and not an imaginary king, comes out in Carlyle more than in any man I know, and I am shocked at myself when I feel how I have been refusing to hear it, and only interpreting it by the devil's cry, "What have I to do with thee?" which mingles in it. Irving shows the other side of Carlyle's Puritanism. He was utterly and purely a theologian; God was all in all to him. From God he must begin. And how to establish a relation between God and mankind on the Calvinistic hypothesis, which he nobly determined not to abandon for any Arminian or semi-Arminian compromises; this was the problem in trying to solve which he gave up his fame and his life. From what I have read of Mrs. Oliphant I cannot believe that she has succeeded in presenting this struggle clearly to her readers. But if she has given even a hint of it, so that people may feel him to have been the most vigorous Protestant against the religion of the newspapers and Exeter Hall that has appeared in our generation, she deserves much gratitude. I hope you will not let your dislike of Carlyle, which if you will search into it you will find to be more democratic than divine, colour your judgment of his friend, whom, in spite of enormous prejudice against him, I was forced and am now more than ever forced to reverence and love.'

The 'Tracts for Priests and People' were completed by June, 1862, and were then published in two volumes, the contributors having been:—Mr. T. Hughes, Rev. Francis Garden, Rev. J. Ll. Davies, Mr. J. N. Langley, Mr. J. M. Ludlow, Rev. C. P. Chretien, Sir Edward Strachey, the Hon. and Rev. W. H. Lyttelton, Mr. R. H. Hutton, Rev. C. K. Paul, and my father.

His contributions had been "The Mote and the Beam; a clergyman's lesson from the present panic"; "Comments" on Mr. Garden's tract on the Atonement; "Morality and Divinity," a review of two sermons published by the Bishop of Oxford on the 'Essays and Reviews' and of an answer to those sermons put forth by an Oxford layman; a paper on the Voluntary Principle in America; a tract "Do Kings reign by the Grace of God?" and a letter to Mr. Hutton on his tract "The Incarnation and Principles of Evidence."

Several of my father's contributions indicate the feelings of increasing distrust and opposition with which for years he had been viewing the proceedings of Bishop Wilberforce, who more and more, as it seemed to him, was led by the temptations of rhetoric, and the love of personal popularity and influence, into courses which would have been impossible during his earlier life. The tract on "The Grace of God" is an earnest defence of the "D. G." of the coinage as an all-important assertion that our kings do reign by the grace of God and not by grace of the people, and that there will be an end of all liberty when the principle that the people's wilful determination is the only law, replaces the reign of law and right as represented by the Crown.

The letter to Mr. Hutton contains a piece of autobiography which, though it belongs to an earlier portion of the life, will probably be more easily understood at this point than it would have been at the period to which it refers. The passage follows appropriately upon the letters on Mr. Irving.

As the extract represents the earliest stage of the development in my father's mind of the central thought of his belief, it seems of so much importance on its own account that it is right to give it entire. The time to which he refers is about the year 1830. In any case, the passage would apply to the period between his going up to Oxford towards the beginning of 1830 and his taking orders in January 1834. It has, however, this interest apart from the immediate subject of it, that it represents the mode in which his thoughts were formed at each stage of his life, and the sense in which external influence acted on him.

'Irving found that he could not maintain the Incarnation in its reality and power if he shrank from the assertion that evil in all its ghastliness, in all its attractiveness, offered itself to the mind and will of Christ. That it was rejected by the mind and will no one could affirm more vehemently than he did. But to adopt any shift for the sake of making the conflict a less tremendous one than it is in the case of any son of Adam, seemed to him to be dishonouring Christ under pretence of asserting His purity, and to be depriving human creatures of the blessings and victory which He took flesh to give them. He therefore used language, which inevitably startled and staggered those who knew, what the suggestions of evil were to them, how much they seemed to involve a participation in it. I could not evade the force of their appeals to the testimony of our consciences as well as of Scripture. I could as little evade the force of his. It seemed to me that if there was not a way out of the difficulty the Gospel meant nothing. The old theology which Mr. Irving had grafted upon his Scotch confession showed me this way. According to that confession the race stood in Adam, and had fallen in Adam; then a scheme of salvation of which the Incarnation formed a step was necessary to rescue certain persons from the consequences of the fall. Mr. Irving had begun to regard the Incarnation, not merely as a means to a certain end, in which some men were interested, but, as the very manifestation of God to men, as the link between the creature and the Creator. But what could the Incarnation, on his previous hypothesis, be but the descent into a radically evil nature? Some of Mr. Irving's Scotch opponents perceived the difficulty, and resorted to the hypothesis of our Lord taking the unfallen nature of Adam. He regarded the suggestion as a miserable subterfuge, which made the relation between Christ and actual men an utterly unreal one. It led me to ask myself, "What does that unfallen nature of Adam mean? Did not Adam stand by God's grace, by trust in Him? Did he not fall by trying to be something in himself? Could he have had a nature which was good independent of God more than we? Is not such a notion a subversion of Christian belief? But did the race ever stand in him? Old theology taught quite a different doctrine."

Our own Articles set forth Christ very God and very man—not Adam—as now and always the Head of the race. They teach us of an infection of nature which exists in every son of Adam. They call that a departure from original righteousness. This original righteousness stands, and has always stood, in Christ the Son of God, and in Him only. Here, it seemed to me, was the true practical solution of the difficulty. I could believe that the Head of man had entered fully into the condition of every man, had suffered the temptations of every man, had wrestled with the enemy of every man; and that He had brought our humanity untainted and perfect through that struggle. And this because He had never lost his trust in His Father, His obedience to His Father—had never asserted independence as Adam did, as each one of us is continually doing. His temptations become then, real in the most tremendous sense. They were more fierce than any mere individual can ever undergo. He did, in truth, feel the sins—bear the sins—of the whole world. And every man may turn to Him as knowing his own special danger, his easily besetting sins, as having felt the power of them. And no man has a right to say, “My race is a sinful, fallen race,” even when he most confesses the greatness of his own sin and fall; because he is bound to contemplate his race in the Son of God, and to claim by faith in Him his share of its redemption and its glory. I can therefore do justice to the Unitarian protest against the language in which many who call themselves orthodox describe the condition of mankind, just because I adopt the belief in the perfect divinity and the perfect manhood of the Son of God. I can, with the most inmost conviction, assert that in me—that is, in my flesh—dwelleth no good thing, just because I feel that all good which is in me, or in any one, is derived from the perfect humanity of Christ, and that, apart from that, I am merely evil. Just so far as I have been able to grasp this belief in a Head of humanity—just so far the greatest problems of ethics seem to me to find a solution; just so far do I see a light in the midst of the deepest darkness, a hope rising out of the depths of despair, a unity which is mightier than all sects and divisions.'

To Rev. J. Ll. Davies.

'5 Russell Square, June 18, 1862.

I have been much troubled about Heath, for his sake immediately, and for the ultimate evil to the Church. I fear that his counsel lost their temper from his quiddities and deafness, and did not do what they might have done for him. He certainly meant no harm, and yet has been the cause of one of the most dangerous decrees that has ever gone forth from the Ecclesiastical Courts. The judges fancied that they could touch no one but the defendant before them. I scarcely know whom they have not touched. But clearly our duty is to sit still. If they attack us we must consider how we ought to act. My inclination would be to employ no counsel; but simply to declare what I believe and let them decide as they choose. But I hope God will direct us better than we can direct ourselves. Meantime, do not fash yourself more than you can help about such matters.'

To Mr. J. N. Langley.

'June 19, 1862.

Mr. Parker imputes to you the opinion that God is naturally the Father of all human beings. This is the misrepresentation which you will find in every one of their complaints against us, and which should, if possible, be cleared away. There is no point about which I have taken more pains, but in general with little success. I think I explained myself most clearly about it in a letter to Mr. Binney respecting a critique of his in the Patriot, on my article about the Revision of the Liturgy. The letter was published by Mr. Binney, of his own accord, but with my permission, in the second edition of his book on the Church in Australia.'

To a Son, an undergraduate at Oxford, who had written of Mr. Jowett.

‘MY DEAREST E.,

‘Saturday (June or July, 1862.)

‘I think you may make a very fair Boswell; but that you may make something much better. You must not forget one important quality of Boswell. He never stumbled at contradictions. Johnson often said things directly inconsistent with each other. Most thoughtful men who speak what they mean, and feel strongly at any given time, do. Boswell’s profound hero-worship did not suffer him to suppress either sentiment. Nor did he give himself much trouble about reconciling them or making them fit in to each other. They both proceeded from the oracle, and were therefore both equally sacred.

‘All you tell me of Mr. Jowett’s conversation is very interesting and just what a man so consistent and also so courageous as he is, was likely to utter in the course of a walk. But if you should hear that he has spoken at other times what seems to you at variance with what you heard, you are not to be startled or to doubt your informant’s veracity, or to suspect Mr. Jowett himself of blowing hot and cold. Different aspects of a principle or a fact present themselves to the same man in different moods of his mind; he expresses what he perceives at each time with equal precision and deliberation; both opinions may be probably more instructive together than either would be separately. For instance, when he told you that the idea that a fact had occurred might possibly be of the same use as the fact itself, he uttered a sentiment which he might find it necessary not only to explain and modify, but even to refute on some other occasion. He might perceive that taken literally in its full extent, it would even invest Legend with a worth above History. If Legend embody ideas, and History is, as many think, a mere collection of bare facts—the bread without the gin*—the legend must be esteemed more than the history. Against such an inference, Mr. Jowett would of course protest. He would see in it a chink through which all superstition and falsehood might enter.

* This is a kind of inverted allusion to Falstaff’s bread and sack.

‘Nevertheless, I do not undervalue legends. They contain man’s attempts to feel after God’s ideas; they bear witness that no idea can be presented to us without some vesture. But the vesture of God’s own ideas must be facts. If He reveals His ideas to us, the revelation must be through facts. I accept the revelation recorded in the Scripture as a revelation of the Divine mind through facts. I accept all History as revelation of some portion of the Divine mind through facts. I believe the modern process of idealising tends to destroy ideas and facts both, and to leave nothing but a certain deposit of both. The sensation novel is the appropriate sink or cesspool for this deposit. All historical criticism is good, it seems to me, just so far as it tests facts in love and reverence for facts, and for what facts contain; all is bad and immoral which introduces the notion that it signifies little whether they turn out to be facts or no, or the notion that their reality as facts depends upon certain accidents in the narration of them. I do not believe Mr. Jowett would ever encourage either notion, though both are encouraged by men called orthodox and called liberal.’

To the Rev. J. A. Macmahon, returning thanks for a reference to his ‘Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy.’

‘MY DEAR SIR,

‘5 Russell Square, W.C., July 21.

Allow me to thank you most gratefully for your translation of Aristotle’s ‘Metaphysics,’ and for your very kind notice of me in the Preface. I am so very little used to such friendly recognitions—yours, I believe, is the first I ever received, in print at least, for a task on which I certainly bestowed some pains—that I appreciate it the more keenly. But if I had been ever so rich in praises, I should still value most highly that of a true scholar and real metaphysician like yourself. I am very glad for the sake of other students that you have had courage and patience to work in this mine; I believe it is a more real science than translating modern German commentaries and compilations which young men read in hopes of knowing everything in the heavens above and the earth beneath, and which really does not help them much to that knowledge of themselves that all the true men of the old world thirsted for. To get even a glimpse of that is better than to find much sympathy, though I am sure that is to be prized very highly too.'

To the Rev. Alfred Starkey (on the Athanasian Creed).

'5 Russell Square, W.C., July 22, 1862.

- 'As I was born and brought up a Unitarian, and as I have found in many of the Unitarian body whom I have known and do know, Divine graces which I have not found in myself, you will suppose that the subject upon which you wrote has occupied me frequently and deeply. I wrote upon it more than twenty years ago. I have had occasion to return to it, always with the same result, in the course of these twenty years. You will easily suppose that I have subjected myself to the charge of straining words to an unnatural sense and of stifling my convictions, and that I have had to ask myself in God's presence whether the charge was true or not, for I know none which is more terrible. If I am guilty of the crime alleged against me I am more guilty than others, for I have gone into it more deliberately. The Athanasian Creed has been a greater help to me than almost any document in leading me (1) to determine that I must adhere strictly and literally to the words, "Judge not, that ye be not judged"—allowing no evasions from them in the case of any person whatsoever; (2) to examine what is the natural, scriptural, orthodox sense of the language of the Creed, and whether it can bear the construction which is put upon it by those who read it hastily and apply to it the maxims which are current in our day.
- '(1) If I took the Athanasian Creed to mean that any one who does not hold certain intellectual notions about the Trinity must without doubt perish everlastingly, I must take it to condemn not Unitarians, not Arians, not Tritheists of every kind merely, but all women, children, poor people, whose minds have not been exercised in logical inquiries, and are not capable of understanding logical results. I should take it to exempt from everlasting death not the meek and lowly of heart, but many who have been particularly the reverse of this, proud disputers who have arrived at orthodox conclusions without being in any moral state which the Holy Ghost can recognise. If you can persuade yourself that any good man who wrote such a creed in any age intended this, or that any good men who have repeated it since, have adopted it with that intention, I cannot; I reject that sense as simply impossible. No one has a right to say that was the mind of the imposer of the Creed; no one I believe who thinks seriously will say it.

But what other sense will the words bear? Not some modification of this; not some qualified condemnation of certain persons, the others being saved; but simply the very reverse of this. The name of the Trinity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, is, as the fathers and schoolmen said continually, the name of the Infinite Charity, the perfect Love, the full vision of which is that beatific vision for which saints and angels long even while they dwell in it. To lose this, to be separated from this, to be cut off from the Name in which we live and move and have our being, is everlasting death. There is no other account to be given of that state into which we fall when we are divided from Him who is the Life, the eternal life of His creatures. But who incur this separation? I know not. You and I, while we are repeating the Creed, may be incurring it. The Unitarian may be much nearer the kingdom of Heaven than we are. He may in very deed less divide the substance, less confound the persons, than we do. For I feel myself that when I fall into an un-Christian heartless condition, I do divide the substance, I do confound the persons inevitably, even though I may be arguing ingeniously and triumphantly for the terms that denote distinction and union.

- 'The Athanasian Creed then has prevented me from claiming even that modified right to condemn which you say you can admit. I dare not say of any person that he has cut himself off from the fellowship of that God whom St. Paul said that all people were feeling after if haply they might find Him. I dare not say of myself that I am not in danger of cutting myself off from it.
- '(2) The Athanasian Creed has led me to ask myself, "What does the Bible mean, what does the Creed mean, what have all earnest Christians meant, when they have spoken of Eternal Life, and of that Life as connected with the knowledge of God, as being the knowledge of God?" Have they meant life that lasts a very, very, very long time? Is that the natural sense of the word eternal when it is opposed to temporal? Is it the orthodox sense? Is it the Scriptural sense? Can I speak of this word as belonging emphatically to God, who "is and was and is to come," and then say, "It means an interminable series of future ages"? Am I not departing from the signification I at first felt to be the true one? Am I not unfairly slipping into another? What signify the logical limitations as to "à parte," etc.? Do you find them in the Bible; in your own conscience; or reason? Can you thus limit eternity by time notions?
- 'I leave you to think over these hints. I would not for the world tempt you to twist your conscience to meet any considerations of expediency. It will be the worse for me here and hereafter if I have twisted mine.'

Also to Rev. Alfred Starkey.

'5 Russell Square, July 24, 1862.

- 'I cannot be sorry that my letter raised those questions in your mind, which, you say truly, it did not the least settle. I know nothing which is so likely to deliver us from the shallowness of our popular divinity and our popular infidelity, and to bring us again into sympathy with the language and the faith of apostles and martyrs, as an earnest and prayerful meditation upon the meanings which we attach to the words Eternal Life and Eternal Death. It would not really withdraw us from fellowship even with the favourite phrases of our own time; it might help us to give them a more full signification and to rescue them from the cant and unreality into which they are continually falling and reducing us.

Thus the phrase "lost souls," which is continually applied by preachers to persons going about in this world, might assist you in considering whether there is anything strange in predicating eternal death of those who are without God here or hereafter. The "lost soul" does not mean one fallen into temporal death. It means one in spiritual death. It intimates that a spiritual being, created for a certain state without which its faculties and existence are unintelligible and contradictory, has lost the possession or fruition of that state. It means that a creature which draws its life from the Eternal God is deprived of the Life that most directly, essentially, truly is His; the Life which Christ manifested to men, and of which He desired men to be partakers. Now this life St. John reasonably and simply calls "Eternal Life;" the life which was with the Father, and which has been declared to us. To say that a creature deprived of this Life, wholly or in any degree, cannot ever enter into it, would be to deny the doctrine which our Evangelical clergy preach most earnestly, for they speak of the Gospel as "a message to lost souls;" whether they would admit the assertion or not, they preach a deliverance from Eternal Death; the capacity of spirits which have fallen into it, for entrance into Eternal Life. That they carefully limit the possibility to the threescore years and ten of men's pilgrimage here is undoubtedly true. Whether they are right or wrong in doing so, it is not the use of the word Eternal either in the Scriptures or in the Athanasian Creed which obliges them to that course. They may have other sufficient reasons for telling men that all beyond the term allotted to us here is under a new law; under a hopeless condition; but it is not the announcement of a second death infinitely more terrible than bodily death, which gives them their reason. Into that second, more terrible death, men do fall who are walking under the light of the sun and performing all bodily functions; out of it Christ does raise them. He brings them out of darkness and the shadow of death, out of the very pit of hell. The unquenchable fire which is to burn up all chaff, blazes as fiercely as ever; but they find it to be a fire of love, and can rejoice that it should destroy whatever in them is unloving.

“ [A sheet is here missing.]

“ I am glad that what I said respecting the damnatory clauses of the Creed commended itself to your conscience. You will see, I think, how it is connected with what I have said now. The fathers and the mediæval writers (those who are confessedly the most orthodox) speak continually of the Trinity as the “Eternal Charity,” and as the foundation of all human life. They were men such as we are; liable to be opinionative, disputatious, cruel, persecuting. The horror they felt of separation from the Eternal Love expressed itself in deep devotions and in forms that were to last through ages. The opinionativeness, bitterness, cruelty, persecution, expressed itself in words spoken, in acts done, against men of their own age. We who have discovered the folly and wickedness of persecution, the idleness of anathemas—God having shown it us by His providence—boast ourselves of these discoveries, and treat the ages behind us with lofty pity, or scorn, or hatred. We cast aside with these discoveries any sense of the evil and terror of being separated from the God of Love and Light, and being given up to serve the Spirit of Malice and Darkness. Our orthodox and our liberals seem equally indifferent about that danger. Those who feel themselves ready to fall into the clutches of the Evil Spirit, those who see what an influence he is exercising all around them, turn to the old Creeds and find in them a witness for One who can hold them up and deliver them out of [the power of evil]. . . . If those who left them that witness, tampered with Satan and in many of their proceedings confessed his dominion, we know that they have repented of that sin; we know that they would have us seek their God and our God and cry to Him against it in the forms in which it most easily and closely besets us.'

To a Son in the army about to start for India.

'MY DEAR F.,'

'August 1862.

'... When I speak to many men among the clergy as well as among the laity of their calling, I do not find that they attach much force to the word. They have entered a certain profession which on the whole they prefer to any other, or at least to which they are bound since they entered upon it; that is all. . . .

'The clergy you know are obliged to say that they believe themselves to be called by the Holy Ghost to the office of the ministry. Many object to that language. They wish it blotted out of our service. They think it marks out the clergyman as different from other men. They think it leads him to falsehood. The blessing of it to me has been very great. I have learnt from it wherein the clergyman is different from other men, wherein he is like all men. He is different from other men inasmuch as he has tasks to perform which other men have not to perform. He is like other men inasmuch as they have all a general calling as men, and have all their specific callings as lawyers, physicians, soldiers, tradesmen. The clergyman who attaches any importance to the baptism which he shares with all men, cannot suppose that his general calling is higher than theirs. He cannot suppose that there can be any state greater and more glorious than that of being a member of Christ, a child of God, an inheritor of the kingdom of Heaven.

'If he supposes his specific calling to be higher than theirs, it can only be on this plea; that he is appointed to tell all men what they are, who calls them to their works, what strength they have for fulfilling their works. He is only entitled to the epithet of a divine so far as he believes in his heart, and can declare with his lips to all his fellows, that their position is fixed for them by God, and that they will have his help day by day in understanding it and maintaining it.

‘Therefore I prize the words of our ordination service. I may have entered very imperfectly into them when I used them first, though I did not use them dishonestly. But every year has made it clearer to me that I have no right and no power to speak a word if the Spirit of God is not really with me, and that I was to say so once and am to say so still, that other men who need His presence as much as I do may be confident that He is also with them and may ask for His guidance continually. I know how many there are who would tell me that I might apply this language to any occupation more properly than to yours. They will say that your calling cannot be a godly one, that I am profaning what is holy when I am daring to talk of a Spirit of love and peace as dwelling with the soldier and prompting his deeds. I have considered the arguments of those who speak thus—I was brought up to regard them as almost self-evident; I have deliberately rejected them.

‘The Bible has convinced me, history has convinced me, personal experience has convinced me, that they are not true. I find the expression Lord of Hosts everywhere in the Scriptures, and I accept it as a right and honest expression of a great truth. I find that the leaders of armies and that armies themselves have done nobly, works which I recognise as God’s works. I find a spirit of order and obedience in them which I scarcely find elsewhere, and which I wish civilians could imitate. I find justice, gentleness, tenderness not merely mixing with such qualities in military men, but eminently characteristic of some among them. This being the case, I have solemnly and with my whole heart and soul refused to make an exception from the maxim which I think governs all offices and undertakings in the case of the office and undertaking of the soldier.

‘I recognise him in battles and in the preparation for battle, as the servant of the living God. I believe the Spirit of God as really calls him to his duties and fits him for them as He calls me to mine. And having this faith—without which it would be anguish to think of you in India or anywhere—I feel more bound to insist upon this principle when I discourse about soldiers than in almost any other case.

‘For I see how terrible have been, how far more terrible must be, the effects of a loss of this faith, in the mind of armies generally, and of the individuals who compose them. The sense of power which armies give is something so tremendous—the illustrations of it in the history of the Roman armies, which had prevailed through discipline and obedience, when they began to think they could govern the state and make emperors, are so palpable; that every true citizen must ask himself, “Who will guard our guardians, who will keep them from being our destroyers?” The question is serious at all times, it was never so serious as now, when the faith in mere constitutional arrangements is growing faint, when so many are crying out for that organisation of forces which they say is only to be attained under a military despot. If while this temper is appearing among civilians, the soldier parts with the feeling, which has never been extinct yet in the Englishman, though at times desperately weak, of a vocation, if he accepts the statement of pious men that he is only a devil’s instrument, the prospect for this land and for all lands is darker than one dares to contemplate. But a mere vague impression of there being something good, gentlemanlike, patriotic in your profession will not avail to counteract this temptation, which will become greater every day, which many of the circumstances of such a country as India are likely to foster. Nothing, I believe, short of a firm conviction, growing with the experience of personal weakness, that you have a calling, that it cannot be fulfilled unless you are just, manly, gentle, in all your doings to all the people with whom you converse, and that there is a Divine overseer of your thoughts and purposes who is inspiring you with justice, manliness, gentleness, who is fighting in you against what is false, inhuman, ungracious, and that your Guide, Teacher, Restrainer, is the Guide and Teacher and Restrainer, whether they heed Him or not, of all your superiors, equals, dependents, of your own countrymen, and of the natives, nothing but this will stand you in stead when savage impulses get hold of you, and there are motives which seem to justify them, and the public opinion of your class is in favour of them, and you have the power of indulging them.'

CHAPTER XIII.

"I believe that the history of the Bible is the history of a Redemption, that we do not know God till we regard Him as a Deliverer, that we do not understand our own work in the world,—least of all the priest's work,—till we believe that we are sent into it to carry out His designs for the deliverance of ourselves and of our race."—F. D. M., Letter to Archdeacon Hare.

DR. COLENZO ON THE PENTATEUCH—MY FATHER'S EMBARRASSMENT—INTENSE DESIRE TO OPPOSE THE BISHOP'S VIEW—GREAT UNWILLINGNESS TO GO WITH A MULTITUDE AGAINST HIM—WISHES TO RESIGN LIVING AT VERE STREET IN ORDER MORE STRONGLY TO ASSERT HIS ATTACHMENT TO THE ENGLISH CHURCH—CHANGE OF PURPOSE AND ITS MOTIVES.

BISHOP COLENZO had published in 1861 his 'Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans.' Bishop Wilberforce was very anxious to secure a condemnation of this Commentary by the bench of bishops, and was stopped from doing so by the late Archbishop of Canterbury [Tait], then Bishop of London. Whatever may be the merits of that question, it is necessary as a matter of historical accuracy that it should be kept clear from that of the Book on the Pentateuch, which was not published till late in the year 1862. Bishop Colenso had written to my father, telling him of his intention to publish his book on the Pentateuch, and giving some expression to his views. My father had corresponded with him, with increasing anxiety and distress, and had asked him to pay a visit to Brampton Ash, where my father was taking duty for the summer.

To Rev. J. Ll. Davies.

'Brampton Ash, Market Harborough, August 28, 1862.

'I was much touched with what you say of Ruskin. Anything which makes him doubt his own infallibility will, I am sure, do him good. He is earnest, I am convinced, and will come quite right.

‘I am not a little anxious about Colenso. You will hear strange reports about him. They are many of them not true. But he is strangely bewildered I think. I do not see how he can keep his bishopric. Let this however be quite private. I say it to prepare you for anything he may say to you if you meet him. He will, I believe, run down here for a day or two. I have asked him to do so.

‘I have been writing a series of dialogues between a layman and a clergyman about family worship. They introduce a great many topics and will be very unpopular if they should ever appear.’

During the following month (I believe on September 6), Bishop Colenso met my father at No. 2, Palace Gardens, Bayswater.* As the Bishop’s views were more and more clearly laid before my father, it seemed to my father more and more clear that the Bishop’s duty was to resign his bishopric. At length he gave expression to his thought in the form, “Well, I think the consciences of Englishmen will be very strongly impressed with the feeling that you ought to resign your bishopric.” My father always drew a very wide distinction between the duty of paying respect to men’s consciences, to the sense of right and wrong developed by genuine care and thought upon a question, and the absolute duty of disregarding mere opinions, the things that men glibly repeat after their fuglemen. It was in this sense that he spoke to the Bishop, who, intending merely to convey his own belief that the question was one for him to decide for himself, replied: “Oh you know, if it comes to that, there are plenty of people who say that you have no business to hold your living.”

* I ought perhaps to say that my report of this conversation is derived from my father and the Bishop. Except that in reporting the purpose with which the words were used, I have quoted respectively the Bishop’s explanation of his own words, and my father’s of his, there was no discrepancy whatever between the two accounts, which were each given personally to me.

He spoke in the sense of assuming that my father's position was unassailable; and therefore that at least to my father the unfairness of such an appeal as he had made ought to be clear. The words had an effect the very opposite of what Dr. Colenso had intended. My father replied at once: "Very well, if that is so—if there are those who conscientiously believe that I am holding my belief in the Church's Creeds and in the Bible for the sake of the money I get for my chapel—I think that that is so great a scandal that I shall at once resign my living." He wrote to Mr. Davies to ask him to come down and see him, wishing to talk the matter over.

To Rev. J. Ll. Davies.

'Brampton Ash, Market Harborough, September 23, 1862.

"The pain which Colenso's book has caused me is more than I can tell you. I used nearly your words, "It is the most purely negative criticism I ever read," in writing to him. Our correspondence has been frequent but perfectly unavailing. He seems to imagine himself a great critic and discoverer, and I am afraid he has met with an encouragement which will do him unspeakable mischief. He says I have only appealed to his pride in my argument. I fancy I wounded his pride even more than I ought. I appealed to his love of truth. I asked him whether he did not think Samuel must have been a horrid scoundrel if he forged a story about the I AM speaking to Moses, and to my unspeakable surprise and terror he said "No. Many good men had done such things. He might not mean more than Milton meant." He even threw out the notion that the Pentateuch might be a poem; and when I said, that to a person who had ever asked himself what a poem is, the notion was simply ridiculous, he showed that his idea of poetry was that it is something which is not historical. And his idea of history is that it is a branch of arithmetic. I agree with you that it is very difficult to say to what point of disbelief he may go; but it seems to me just as likely, with his tolerance of pious frauds, that he may end in Romanism and accept everything.

‘But I cannot forget his exceeding generosity to me at a very great risk to himself. If I am bound by my duty to the Church, and to him as a friend, to remonstrate on the course he is now pursuing, I am also bound not to let any one suppose I desert him for the sake of preserving my own position. These considerations make my course somewhat embarrassing. I do, however, begin to see clearly at least what is demanded of me. That is one of the points on which I should like to talk to you ; though I would rather have been here than in London.’

To Rev. S. Clark.

‘Brampton Ash, Market Harborough, October 4, 1862.

‘MY DEAR CLARK,

‘I hope that we shall be in town on Tuesday. But I cannot put off till I see you there, the announcement of a resolution to which I have come. I know it is kinder to do so than to leave the task to my wife. She would have told you of her trouble ; but it would have cost her a great effort, and I, who have caused it, ought to bear the burden. Moreover, it is a great comfort to speak of it to such a friend as you have always been.

‘You know, of course, this business of Colenso. You know how he had identified himself with me, and how great a struggle it must be to me to disclaim him, especially when he is putting himself to great risk. Yet I think him so utterly wrong, that I must do it at all risks to him or me. How to do it and yet not to put myself entirely in the wrong with respect to him, and so to injure the cause of God far more than myself, has been a subject of earnest thought with me. It has obliged me to consider my whole position at Vere Street. I had long perceived that that was put in jeopardy by the recent decisions in Heath’s case, and in Wilson’s case. I had prepared myself for a prosecution, and had determined that when it came I would not go into the court, but would rather retire. To plead by help of an ingenious counsel for permission to do what I feel I must do to fulfil my ordination vows, seemed to me mischievous. But I had meant to wait till the blow came. Now I see very clearly that I ought to anticipate it. If I give up Vere Street, stating my reasons for doing so very fully in a letter to my congregation, I can distinguish my position from that of all who wish to diminish the authority of the Scriptures. I can show that my only offence is that of adhering too literally to the words of the Prayer-Book and Articles. I am quite convinced that by making the sacrifice of my income I may preserve my position as a minister in the Church, and may make the position of all who determine to teach according to its formularies, and not to accept the Spurgeon doctrine, in place of its doctrine, more intelligible, and more safe. If I were cast in a suit, or were deprived of my ministry without one, I believe I might have caused a schism; by taking this course, I hope I shall do something—at least, what is in me—to avert one.

‘Of course the change is a serious one. It is like beginning anew at fifty-seven. But I believe God has given and will give me strength to work for my wife, and for my children, while they need it. I shall be glad if you could advise about the way.’

To Rev. C. Kingsley.

‘5 Russell Square, October 12, 1862.

‘I have passed through some painful hours in these last few weeks, but I can truly say that such a letter as yours this evening would make up for ten times that amount of suffering. It has given me a delight that I cannot express, mixed with much shame, that I should ever have misunderstood you, or suspected you of being anything less than I have ever known you and believed you to be. I will not do myself the injustice to confess that I was jealous of your differing from me or deserting a guidance which, as you know, I always disclaimed. But I have been fearful at times of your not being true to yourself and your own higher instincts. And I do most heartily and joyfully renounce all such fears, and ascribe them to my own habit of thinking evil. Indeed, I may say that as I have never encountered more opposition from wife, sisters, friends, than in this last resolve of mine—no one approving of it—so I have never had such proofs of their profound affection and forbearance. And your letter and Mrs. Kingsley's most kind one to my wife make the cup of kindness as full and overflowing as it well can be.

‘I will now tell you why, feeling the strength of all your arguments, I yet think that the resolution I have formed is the right one and ought not to be abandoned.

‘1stly. I have no right to overlook the very great probability that Lushington's decision upon the word Eternal would have been made to tell upon the person who has put himself most prominently forward in maintaining the opposite sense. If I had been attacked, I could not have resisted that decree; I must have been deprived by it. I should then have lost all power of ministering in the Church. I should have fixed the chain upon it irrevocably. Numbers would then have been puzzled about their position and have felt that they must adopt the damnation theory or resign. By taking the matter into my own hands I avert this peril. I provoke attention to the subject. I claim to be the simple and orthodox interpreter of the language of the Church. It is for you to follow this movement, not by deserting your posts, but by calling for a reversal of the decree. And practically, if not in terms, you will succeed. The feeling upon this subject, I know, in the country among laymen and clergymen both, is very deep. It requires to be roused. People do not dare to face their own convictions. They have never fairly been told that it is their duty as Churchmen to cherish these convictions. One voice, feeble though it be, saying this and accompanying this speech with an act which shows that it does come from the inmost heart, may do more than you dream of. What it will do, is not to provoke imitation of the particular means which I find most convenient in my own case for enforcing my arguments, but to fix the thoughts of the clergy upon the end at which I aim. "Friends, are ye sent with a message that God destroys the world, or that He saves it?" You ought to know. The question is not a trifle. Say then which, or for ever hold your tongues. Very few will like to say, "We are not sent to preach Redemption." You must compel them to say earnestly and resolutely, "We are." Is it not worth parting with Vere Street, if there is a hope—only a hope—of kindling such a feeling—yes, of precipitating such a crisis as this? It is terrible to go on saying, "Peace, peace," when there is really no peace, but destruction taking the name of a Gospel.

I know well that my dear and honoured friend Dr. Lushington, whom I love as much as almost any man of his age that I know, has no purpose of working this mischief or any mischief to the Church and to mankind. He will be a worker of good, as he ought to be, if his simple blunders lead to the result I have supposed. To promote that result by any means I am sure is a clear duty.

2ndly. There are several men besides Z. who are throwing up their livings, expressly because they say they cannot conform to such antiquated books as the Bible and the Common Prayer-Book. To have one saying, "I give up the income of my living because I hold to these antiquated books and will not accept the cruel modern interpretations of them," may restore the balance in the minds of our countrymen. It will, I think, have some influence—more than merely for its own sake it ought to have—on the minds of the Dissenters, and will lead them to think whether all the bondage for which they affect to commiserate us does not really come from the imitation of them.

3rdly. Colenso's act therefore, though it clinched my resolution, and seemed to me to make any other way embarrassing for me, only showed me what would have been best at all events. My mind has been nearly racked this vacation at the thought that the whole family life of England, and all our old civil morality, must go to wreck if there is not some witness that the Father of all is not a destroyer. At the same time I have faith and hope, at times most cheering and invigorating, that some of our scientific men and our Secularists, if they could be spoken to as husbands and fathers, not as schoolmen, might pass from Atheism into the most cordial belief. Arguments about a Creator will fall dead upon them. A message from a Father may rouse them to life. Again, I but give a hint, which you and such as you must turn to profit. People will not hear me. My words they call strange and mystical. If I can awaken them by an act which they will also think strange and foolish, to give heed to men who can command their ears and hearts, I shall be too thankful.

‘I must, however, set my mind now towards the future. Somewhere—I suppose it must be either in London, Oxford or Cambridge—if I could turn an honest penny by taking pupils in theology, ecclesiastical history, or moral philosophy, I should be glad. I do not know how to manage it. Of course I would rather not have them in the house if I can help it. The whole notion may be a dream; but I must attempt something. Can you advise me? Coaching, in the ordinary sense, I should fail in. Any who cared to study with me I might help a little.’

To the Rev. A. P. Stanley (after defending his intentions to resign).

‘October 24, 1862.

‘. . . Then if there is, as I think there is, in laymen and clergymen a real belief beneath all their dilettante half-beliefs—if there is a cry, as I think there is, not loud but deep, for deliverance from the bondage into which their confusions respecting everlasting life and everlasting death have brought them—there will come in time a passionate expression of these latent and inward convictions, which the courts will heed—which it will not be possible for them to disregard. I may do very little to kindle this fire; I may do something. What is told me of the indifference which will be felt about any step I may take, I am prepared for. What I am told about the anxiety it may produce in many minds, I am prepared for. I think both prophecies, though they sound contradictory, will prove true. I think there will be indifference mixed with scorn in an immense majority of those who influence public opinion. I think there will be anxiety and self-inquiry excited in a few. No words which I could speak would break that indifference or mitigate that scorn. No words which I could speak have been able to produce as much of that anxiety as I desire to produce. I do not believe that the many will be more indifferent or more scornful for my resignation. I do not think the anxiety of the few will be as unheathy, as profitless, as that which they are suffering from now, while they suppose that I am partly talking of the Old Testament as the guide to all moral and political wisdom, partly holding with Colenso that it is a book of fictions and forgeries. For young men to be in that kind of doubt about any man who has dared to write for nearly thirty years about such subjects, must be intensely mischievous.

‘The coincidence of the appearance of Colenso’s book with the re-hearing of Wilson’s case has determined the time of my retirement from Vere St. But I should be exceedingly grieved if Dr. Lushington, or any one else, supposed that I chose that moment because I imagined my resignation would affect in the most infinitesimal degree, his decision. Nothing could expose me to more just ridicule than such a fancy. But I think that some of this just ridicule would be incurred by me if I were to hold my resignation in terrorem over the courts, as if they could care a jot what I shall do or shall not do. The only effect of such a proceeding, if it had any, would be to stimulate in some slight measure the eagerness of the Evangelical party to get his late decision confirmed.

‘There is a book which I doubt not you know well of Vinet’s, ‘Sur la Manifestation des Croyances religieuses.’ I differ from its anti-State doctrines as much as any one can differ. I should never dream of applying even what might be true in reference to a canton of French Switzerland to the condition of a country like England, with an hereditary faith. Nevertheless, there is more in that book than its great eloquence and earnestness, which moved me when I read it, and moves me now. I could not help reflecting that he was making a protest on behalf of freedom of belief, and freedom of expression of belief, against a liberal religious government. I could not but perceive that a negative liberalism, such as that which was, and I suppose is, dominant in Vinet's country, might become persecuting as far as all positive convictions are concerned. And I could not help mixing this consolation with the sorrowful thoughts which such facts suggested, that there never is a time when the manifestation of positive belief is so necessary, and when it may do so much good, as when the world seems divided between orthodoxy and liberalism, each seeking to stifle everything but itself, each recognising no enemy except the other. The third power may be weak at first, but I believe it is God's and will prevail.

'I cannot tell you how I feel all your very very kind words and the importance you seem to set upon an act of mine. I do hope eventually it will help to lighten and not increase your burden.* God, and those who have been with us and are not far from us, will support us in any burthens we may have to bear.'

Letters had poured in upon him from all sides. A hint of his intended resignation of the income received for Vere Street had reached the newspapers, and its meaning had been completely misunderstood. He was supposed to be con-

* Mr. Stanley, who had recently lost his mother, had written to say that if my father would postpone for half a year his resignation, until Dr. Lushington's judgment had been reviewed by the Privy Council, it would be to him "as the lifting of the burden of life, which is not now so easily borne as heretofore."

demning everything which he was anxious to defend, and to be asserting just what he wished to deny. He was never more firmly attached to the Church of England. His single idea was that by a personal sacrifice he could defend her better than was possible whilst he could, by any misconstruction, be supposed to be tempted by his position or income to look at the question with prejudiced eyes. He was supposed to have "conscientious scruples" and doubts of the propriety of his position, when he had not the trace of such feelings. The certainty that his purpose would be misunderstood was put before him by all his friends; but so firmly was he convinced that sooner or later a sacrifice of the kind must produce its effect, that none of these remonstrances changed his determination.

On October 25th, the day after he had received the letter from Arthur Stanley, to which the last letter was a reply, came the following from the Bishop of London (Tait). My father had some time previously written to inform him of his contemplated action, and had already received a letter from Dr. Tait, urging him not to carry out his purpose.

‘MY DEAR MR. MAURICE,

‘Cromer, October 24, 1862.

‘Since I wrote to you on receiving the first intimation of your intention to resign St. Peter’s, Vere Street, I have thought much on the subject. It has not been till to-day that what had at first escaped my attention has distinctly occurred to me, viz. that (unless your position in your chapel is different from what I suppose it to be) if your purpose is to be carried into effect, I must legally be more a party to it than I should wish to be, as the resignation cannot release you without my accepting it. In intimating your intention to resign, you expressed your hope that I would not hereafter consider you unworthy of doing any ministerial work in my diocese to which any brother clergyman might invite you. In answer, assuring you that nothing is abated of that deep respect with which I regard your Christian character, I added that, much as I should myself differ from you in many statements, I am not aware of anything in your opinions, so far as I know them, which should disqualify you from officiating, whether you resign or retain your charge. I expressed also my conviction that the step you meditate might be very injurious to others. I feel indeed that it is fraught with very momentous consequences to the whole Church, which may greatly suffer thereby.

- ‘Under these circumstances, it is only due to you that I should at once state to you, that, in the event of your adhering to your present intention, I may be obliged to consider very carefully whether I shall be justified in accepting your resignation out of deference to your present feeling, or whether I ought on public grounds to refuse to accept it.
- ‘It is of course possible that further explanation may make me view the matter differently, but as it at present stands, I feel that, if you continue in your resolve, I shall be asked by you to consent to what I think a very undesirable step. My former letter was private and confidential, but I do not know why this need be so, if in consulting your friends or otherwise you wish to make use of it. I earnestly pray that we may both be guided aright from above in this matter.’

The above letter could not fail greatly to affect my father's determination; but for some days he delayed his answer to it, and during those days no apparent sign of its effect can be traced in his responses to his friends.* On October 29th, he received a letter from Mr. Bunyon, Dr. Colenso's brother-in-law. Mr. Bunyon used many arguments from the point of view of my father's friends, such as had already failed, but he used one which instantly settled the matter. My father had, after receiving Bishop Colenso's proofs, been so careful not to speak of them to any one to whom the Bishop had not sent them, that he had not mentioned any passages in them to any of his own sisters, though the interview with Dr. Colenso had taken place at the house of one of them. But the Bishop had distributed his proofs freely, and large extracts from the forthcoming book had appeared in the newspapers. It seemed, therefore, to my father, that the matter had become so public that no act of his could affect the publicity of it. Nevertheless Mr. Bunyon wrote that if my father resigned as a protest against Dr. Colenso's book, it would be taking an unfair advantage of Dr. Colenso's having come to him as a friend and having put the proofs into his hand.

* On a day, the exact date of which is uncertain, he gave a promise to Sir F. Pollock not to distribute a circular letter he had had printed for his congregation, explaining his intentions.

"You are prepared to betray him," wrote Mr. Bunyon, "by having an engine of attack to be issued simultaneously with his book. . . . I think this involves a question of honour." The letter was written under the feeling that such a remonstrance was the only means that would stop my father from taking a step which many friends had entreated Mr. Bunyon to do all that he could to prevent. The strong wording was designed to produce the effect which it actually did produce upon a man sensitive to the last degree on the point of honour. Mr. Bunyon had interposed with great reluctance and as a last resource from attachment to my father, and regret that his brother-in-law should have been the occasion of such action.

The blow fell with the effect of a complete surprise upon my father. His action had been largely determined by his dislike to the position of having to oppose an unpopular man, whilst he was thoroughly convinced that it was his bounden duty to oppose the Bishop. The suggestion that his proposed conduct looked a little cowardly, a little like taking the side of the strong against the weak, and altogether unfair, was intolerable to him. It was just that against which he had struggled all his life. In every struggle of his life, his great conviction had been that the solitary man upon the Cross is always ultimately stronger than the surrounding crowds of soldiers and of priests. His great dread had been ever to leave to falsehood the chance of holding the cross-hilted sword. He gave way at once. He wrote a letter of pained and indignant protestation to Mr. Bunyon, saying that he did not think that any one who knew him would attribute such motives to him. He wrote to the Bishop of Natal to say that he would not at all events act before the book appeared. He wrote to a common friend to ascertain whether any previous hint had reached him of any such charge as that now made by Mr. Bunyon, and he wrote to the Bishop of London, in answer to the letter of October 24th, submitting to be guided by his advice as to future action. From the Bishop of Natal he received at once a withdrawal of all charges of breach of confidence, and from the Bishop of London the following letter :

‘Fulham Palace, October 30, 1862.

‘MY DEAR MR. MAURICE,

‘I am most thankful for your note of yesterday, announcing your intention to suspend the issuing of your letter to the Congregation of St. Peter’s, Vere Street, and your willingness to submit to my judgment as to the course you should pursue hereafter. I believe that the best members of the Church of England will thank God, as I do, for the resolve.’

To Rev. A. P. Stanley.

‘MY DEAR STANLEY,

‘November 4, 1862.

‘I took a very sneaking way of making my confession and recantation to you. But when I wrote I did not see my way to do more than say that I would suspend all my doings for a while. I soon perceived that I had been about to injure Colenso when I fancied I was only injuring myself. Then it became clear to me that people did—as you said they would—utterly mistake my meaning and suppose me to be leaving the Church. This being clear, I had no alternative but to say, “I have been utterly wrong, my friends altogether right.” I said so to my congregation last Sunday. It was humiliating, but it was a plain duty.

‘And now let me thank you from my heart and soul for all your kindness and forbearance with me. I must have been most wilful; but I could not see it till the Bishop of Natal complained of the injustice to him. I must now bear the disgrace, and only wish that I could bear the pain I have caused those dearest to me instead of them.’

To a Son, an undergraduate at Oxford.

'MY DEAREST E.,

'November 4, 1862.

- 'P. told you of my change of purpose whilst I was at Cambridge. I longed to have written myself and explained about the matter to you; but I was most harassed and could not see my way clearly enough.
- 'What determined me was the discovery that I should have wronged Bishop Colenso.
- 'From the moment that I saw I should not be making a declaration of principles, at my own cost, but be casting another stone at him, I knew that I must be wrong. Then I gradually perceived from the comments in the papers, and from private letters, that my whole meaning had been mistaken—that I was supposed to be discontented with the Church, when I wished to assert my devotion to it most strongly. Therefore I had nothing to do but to retreat and confess my error. I did so last Sunday before my congregation. I cannot call it eating the leek, except that being a Welshman by origin I am bound to like leeks. But it was a humiliation, however much I might rejoice to feel myself once again the minister of a most kind and friendly people.'

To the same Son (after having heard of Stanley's appointment to Westminster, and Trench's appointment as Archbishop of Dublin).

'MY DEAREST E.,

'November 9, 1862.

- 'Before you get this you will have heard the news of Trench and Stanley. About the former I know not what to say. I think the appointment a very good one. But to see a very old friend sent to such a place as Dublin—to undertake such a task as that of an archbishop—is for me a somewhat awful thing; what must it be to him! Do you remember his saying to you many years ago that no one could wish to be a bishop who was not a hero or a madman? I don't think he is either; but I hope he will be supported by a wisdom which no hero possesses and no madman would seek.

I believe he will enter upon the task in dependence upon that wisdom, otherwise I should be grieved for him indeed.

‘That Stanley should be Dean of Westminster and that he should marry Lady Augusta Bruce,* is to me an immense delight. It would be unmixed if I did not think of the loss which Oxford will suffer in being deprived of him. He came to Vere Street yesterday afternoon and introduced his lady to me. I thought it was so very kind of him; I could scarcely have had a greater pleasure. She has a very pleasant, earnest, thoughtful face, and I should think, from all I have heard of her, would be eminently suitable to him. She gave me the most kind and cordial greeting. I have seldom had so much to interest and excite me on any Sunday. He was so good as to go over to your Aunt Esther the day before to tell her. I hope to see her to-day. I know how much she will have been gratified.

‘I am very glad you like the Ethics. It is a profoundly interesting book. You may come to Plato hereafter and appreciate him. I am quite satisfied that you should recognise the worth of Aristotle at present. Study him well and carefully. I do not complain of your liking the Apology better than the Republic or the Gorgias. It is very noble and is a good preparation for those. I believe Socrates is in all and Plato in all.’

In the midst of the discussion as to his action in regard to Vere Street, he published a volume of ‘Dialogues on Family Worship.’ In reference to these he explains his habitual preference for the dialogue in the following letter.

To Mr. Hutton.

‘December 17, 1862.

‘I am very sorry if I have (in my book) abused the dialogue, which is to me a very holy instrument of setting forth truth,

* Lady Augusta was a sister of my father’s college friend, Lord Elgin, and one of the most attached disciples of Mr. Erskine of Linlathen; my father’s delight refers to what he thus knew of her.

and which I have always wished—since I knew Plato—to redeem from the base service of apologising for some form of opinion. It is very difficult to be faithful to one's own convictions about it; but I know that I wish to be honest and not treacherous in bringing out the side which is not strictly my own, but without which my own would be worth nothing.'

In the same letter he proposed to write a series of letters for the Spectator on the injury to the studies of the Universities caused by the apologetic character of their theological teaching.

'I am convinced that theology is made the weakest of all studies because its basis is laid—as the basis of no other study is laid—in apology. Having brought out this weakness of the college teaching as such, I might go on to show, from my own knowledge, how it was supplemented at Cambridge by the Simeon School; and at Oxford by Newman a few years ago, now by Jowett; the attempt to stifle each one-sided movement proving a ridiculous failure, and the English Church being really peopled with clergy from those schools, the University teaching helping to make each more pugnacious and more-self-satisfied for a while, and, when the crisis comes (as to Colenso and others), more entirely the victims of their own doubts.'

At the end of the year he moved to No. 2 Brunswick Place. A striking incident occurred in the giving up of No. 5 Russell Square. There was at the end of the garden behind the house a stable and coachhouse, which having an independent entrance into a mews, had been let by my father for a term of years to a sub-tenant, a working carpenter. Having received an offer for the lease of the house, my father had arranged the matter himself without consulting his solicitor. As soon as he reported the facts to his lawyer he was told that he had done a very rash thing, that his sub-tenant might give him a great deal of trouble as he could not fulfil the contract he had made by giving possession. "You are completely in his hands, so you had better leave me to go and make the best bargain I can with him." "Very well," said my father, "you shall do so on one condition—that before you do anything else you tell him exactly how the case stands and let him know the advantage he has." Remonstrance being useless, Mr. Burges, the solicitor, gave his promise, and went down to see the tenant with small hopes of success.

He delivered his message as in honour bound, and was at once met by the tenant with an astonished inquiry, "Did Mr. Maurice tell you that you were to tell me that?" Mr. Burges assured him that he had only carried out instructions which certainly were not in the ordinary way of business. "Well now," replied the tenant, "that is what I call the act of a real gentleman, and I will give up the stables this day, or any day, if it will serve him, and will not take anything for doing so! If a man treats me like that I would not meet him any other way but his own for my life!" I give the story on Mr. Burges' authority and with his kind corrections of the proof.

During the earlier phases of the American Civil War my father was a good deal separated in opinion from many of his most intimate friends. Mr. Hughes used to speak of the Republican party in the States as "my party."* Mr. Ludlow's democratic sympathies led him to an even stronger assertion of the absolute right of the Northern cause, the absolute wrong of the Southern.

A meeting on the American question had been announced. The next letter will show the feelings with which at this period, and whilst from political motives the North were keeping the slavery question in the background, my father regarded the struggle. The point is interesting apart from the mere question of his action in this matter, because it accurately illustrates the sense in which he dealt with national subjects

* The fact was certainly so at the time; but I do not know that anything would have pleased my father more than this—that Mr. Hughes now feels so strong a dislike to "party," that he would like the phrase modified so far as to express that fact.

from his pulpit. Wherever these seemed to him to touch on great questions of right and wrong he dealt with them under their moral aspect. Under no circumstances whatever did he use the pulpit for a party purpose, to assume the infallibility of one party and the iniquity of another. He had at all times an extreme dread of taking advantage of "Coward's Castle" to express vehemently his own opinions, his own fancies. The sense of the silent benches before him, the dread of not being able to get men to speak out freely to him, the dread of increasing that silence by any personal dogmatism, were always strong on him. On the question of freedom, however, the announcement of God as a deliverer was a part of the message which he believed that it was his duty to make known.

To Mr. Hughes.

'2 Brunswick Place, York Terrace, N.W., January 26, 1863.

'I have not seen any notice of the Exeter Hall meeting at which you said you should appear, and I don't know what is its definite object. I feel very strongly, as I told the congregation at Vere Street yesterday afternoon, that the invitation to sympathise with those who declare slavery to be the corner-stone of their institutions should be resisted by all who believe in another corner-stone than that. The attempt of the American divines and English newspapers to enlist St. Paul and the New Testament on their side are to be exposed as ridiculous and denounced as hypocritical. I tried in my own place as a clergyman to do this. And I would go to Exeter Hall at least as one of the audience for the same purpose, if I did not feel that the cause was too sacred a one to connect with the faith, the policy, or the success of the North. A wrong move in that direction may, it seems to me, prove very mischievous and throw the game into the hands of the Times and Saturday Review. I think they have made a false move, they have presumed on the dislike of the English people to the Federals, and on their liking for any vigorous insurgency, and are thrusting forward their pro-slavery arguments rashly and in a way that will not be borne.

I should say, do not cut the rope short with which they may hang themselves. Let them fairly and thoroughly commit themselves to the cause which they have in their hearts, let them not have an excuse for confusing it with criticisms upon the blunders of the North or of the English supporters of the North.

‘Perhaps I am wrong. I would not hinder any one from speaking at Exeter Hall who sees clearly that he can do good by speaking. But I cannot see my way to mingle two questions which may ultimately be identical, but which the best and wisest men have an excuse for not perceiving to be identical, about one of which they may feel intensely and therefore may be doubtful about the other. Mill’s article in ‘Fraser’ showed that the Union was very nearly as dear to him as the freedom of the negro. That is natural and reasonable with his traditions. But some of us do not share in them, and would be dishonest if we affected to do so.’

As the war went on and the cause of the North became more and more identified with that of emancipation, he more and more came to sympathise with that side as against the South. When Mr. Carlyle published a contemptuous growl at the cause of emancipation, he instantly broke out into indignant protest. During all the earlier part of the war, however, his intense monarchical feeling, his dread of democracy, as tending to set opinion above law, and therefore as hostile to individual freedom, the disposition of his friends to treat the cause of the North as the cause of their PARTY, separated him very much from them, on a subject on which they felt most vehemently.

To the Rev. H. B. Purton.

‘2 Brunswick Place, York Terrace, February 1863.

‘It was a great pleasure to be reminded of the intercourse we had some years ago in Gloucestershire by your very kind letter. I am glad whenever my books are recognised as real messages by any who have known me. I wish they could always be taken as my efforts after truths which we all want equally, and which I might be better able to reach if I could hear all the doubts and objections which my stammering words raise in honest and earnest minds. They are a kind of fragmentary conversation with known or unknown listeners, but it is much better when one has not to imagine what is said in answer, but can actually hear the answers. I shall be much gratified, therefore, if you will fulfil your promise of writing to me about whatever has perplexed you in my statements.'

To Mr. Hutton (on Mr. Matthew Arnold's essay on Spinoza).

'February 3, 1863.

Arnold's article is too beautiful and too true not to deserve that what is not beautiful and true in it should be laid bare. His three divinities, the power of intellect as exhibited in Parmenides, Spinoza, and Hegel, the religious feelings as exhibited in mankind generally, and literary criticism as exhibited in himself particularly, may be all, I conceive, good or evil dæmons, angels of light or of darkness. The Parmenidean "One," the "Being" of Spinoza, the "Absolute" of Hegel, if they are only conceptions of the intellects of those men, are horrible, ghastly self-contradictions. If they are recognitions by the intellect, of that which the intellect cannot conceive, of a God who must make Himself known, they are blessed and glorious testimonies to truths which are not theirs but universal. If the religious feelings create their own object or objects they must be the sources of all idolatry, superstition, division, hatred; if they are awakened by the object, which is meant for them and can satisfy them, they are good and practical, and they can never be at war with any of the truths of the Reason. If the literary critic assumes himself to be the judge of right and wrong, of the intellects and of the religious feelings, he will labour in his vocation as an Edinburgh, or Quarterly, or Saturday Reviewer, to put out all light but that which he has kindled. If he is a devout seeker to know what is right and wrong, that which is strong in intellect, pure in religious feelings, he may be a gift and treasure to his age, for he will lead it to confess a real and perfect Judge of quick and dead, to expect a perfect revelation of His Light. Arnold appeals to the clergy. If they have any function, it is to preserve men from substituting the intellectual discerner, the man of religious instincts and impulses, the exalted critic, for the Living God.'

In the beginning of 1863 Dr. Pusey and his friends commenced a prosecution of Mr. Jowett in the Small Debts Court, presided over by the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford. On the 19th February, Dr. Pusey wrote to the Times in defence of this proceeding, alleging that a claim had recently been put forward in the 'Essays and Reviews' to put an unnatural construction upon words, and that such and such "doctrines" had been by the writers "denied." On the 20th February my father answered Dr. Pusey. Disclaiming any theological sympathy with either Dr. Pusey or Mr. Jowett, he asserted the importance of each being allowed free scope for their own view of truth, because truth itself being larger than either he or they could see, was made manifest by the conflict between the partial views of each. Incidentally he spoke of the claim to use the articles in a non-natural sense as having been put forward in Tract 90. This brought forth (on February 26th) a letter from Father J. H. Newman, who showed that the contention of Tract 90 had been that Protestants having framed the articles in a sense which would not frighten the Romanists of their day whom they could not afford to offend, it was legitimate for those who now held Romanist doctrine to take the articles in a sense which would cover their views.

My father, in his last letter (February 27th), whilst maintaining his position against Dr. Pusey, frankly accepted Father Newman's explanation in terms appreciative of him. This was acknowledged in a kindly private letter from Father Newman, both of them withdrawing from a discussion which continued in the Times for several weeks, and opened up the whole history of the transactions connected with Mr. Ward's case in 1845 (vide Vol. I. pp. 389-402).

To the Rev. J. De la Touche.

! '2 Brunswick Place, York Terrace, April 6, 1863.

Your letter is one for which some little knowledge of what many others are feeling would have prepared me. What is particularly striking in it, is what you say of your friend the Comtist and his desire that you should hold fast your position. I believe there is more in those words of his than you or I can fathom; an indication of a sense in the minds of men who appear furthest from it, that the Church of England does, they cannot tell how, bear a witness for a largeness of fellowship, for a human union, which no sect bears, which no philosophy bears. Oh! if we could set ourselves sincerely to ask what that witness is—why amidst all appearance of narrowness and the clearest evidences of diversity of opinion among us, we yet are recognised in this character by impartial—scarcely impartial, even unfavourable—onlookers, we might arrive at convictions that would be infinitely precious to us—we might find that there is an eternal rock beneath us on which we may stand.

Perhaps even those parts of our services which cause you most pain and irritation might lead you to perceive that the Church does recognise a foundation for all men, an everlasting Name in which all are living and moving and having their being, whilst you are rather seeking to define more exactly who are and who are not within the pale of the righteous. Perhaps you would perceive that even the Athanasian Creed which, from your point of view, looks and is so horrible, tells us lessons about the eternal Name which we have lost, that we have changed separation from the Eternal God, which is the true calamity of man, into a dark vision of interminable future punishment with which it has nothing to do. Eternal punishment is now as well as hereafter, and Christ who delivers from eternal death as well as bodily death is certainly not tied by the event of man's passing out of the world, which He by His death and resurrection united with the world beyond, from accomplishing the end of His cross and passion.

‘I do not say these things because I expect you to receive them from my lips, but only because I believe them to be true, and because hereafter they may come home to your mind. I would earnestly exhort you not on any occasion, or under any temptations, to say words in the pulpit or in your own ministrations which you do not feel to be true. Keep to the things which you know, testify that you have seen. But do not go about contradicting, and proclaiming that things which you do not see seem to you and must be ridiculous. Do not doubt that there may be more in the Prayer-Book and in the Bible than you have been able to take in. I wish earnestly that all fetters may be taken off minds like yours, though they are not fetters to me. But I am sure that you will find every sect narrower and more cruel than the Church. I am sure that the Church is only narrow and cruel when she apes the sects, and assumes the character of a sect. I will say no more now. Tell me as much as you like or as much as you can of your state of mind. I will at least promise to meet your statements as a man, as a fellow-sufferer and a fellow-sinner.’

Also to Rev. J. De la Touche.

‘Holder House, Dorking, April 14, 1863.

‘I do not know whether you will think me less or more fitted to enter into that tremendous difficulty of which you speak in your last letter, when I tell you that I was brought up a Unitarian, and that I have distinctly and deliberately accepted the belief which is expressed in the Nicene Creed as the only satisfaction of the infinite want which Unitarianism awakened in me, yes, and as the only vindication of the truth which Unitarianism taught me.

‘You feel that our Lord is a man in the most perfect sense of the word. You cannot convince yourself that He is more. No, nor will any arguments convince you that He is more. For what do you mean by that more? Is it a Jupiter Tonans whom you are investing with the name of God? Is it to him you pray when you say our Father which art in Heaven? Is God a Father, really and actually a Father? Is He in heaven far away from our conceptions and confusions, one whom we cannot make in the likeness of anything above, around, beneath us? Or is all this a dream? Is there no God, no Father? Has He never made Himself known, never come near to men? Can men never come near to Him?

Are you startled that I put these questions to you? Do they seem more terrible than any that have yet presented themselves to you? Oh, they are the way back to the faith of the little child; and to the faith of the grown man. It is not Christ about whom our doubts are. We are feeling after God if haply we may find Him. We cannot find Him in Nature. Paley will not reveal Him to us. But He is very near us; very near to those creatures whom He has formed in His own image; seeking after them; speaking to them in a thousand ways.

The belief of a Son who was with Him before all worlds, in whom He created and loves the world; who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven and became incarnate, and died, and was buried, and rose again for us and ascended on high to be the High Priest of the universe; this belief is what? Something that I can prove by texts of Scripture or by cunning arguments of logic? God forbid! I simply commend it to you. I know that you want it. I know that it meets exactly what your spirit is looking after and cannot meet with in any books of divinity. For we have to find out that God is not in a book, that He is, that He must reveal Himself to us, that He is revealing Himself to us.

I am not distressed that you should be brought to feel that these deep and infinite questions—not questions about the arithmetic of the Bible—are what are really haunting and tormenting you. I believe that the clergy must make this discovery. We have been repeating phrases and formulas. We have not entered into them, but only have accepted certain reasonings and proofs about them. Now they are starting up and looking at us as if they were alive, and we are frightened at the sight. It is good for us to be frightened, only let us not turn away from them and find fault with them, but ask God, if we believe that He can hear us, to search us and show us what is true and to bring us out of our Atheism.

‘How, you ask, can I use the prayers of the Church which assume Christ’s divinity when I cannot see sufficient proof that He is Divine? That is a question, it seems to me, which no man can answer for you; nay, which you cannot answer for yourself. If I am right, it is in prayer you must find the answer. Yes, in prayer to be able to pray; in prayer to know what prayer is; in prayer to know whether, without a mediator, prayer is not a dream and an impossibility for you, me, every one. I cannot solve this doubt. I can but show you how to get it solved. I can but say, the doubt itself may be the greatest blessing you ever had, may be the greatest striving of God’s Spirit within you that you have ever known, may be the means of making every duty more real to you.

‘I do not know who your bishop is. If he is a person with whom it is possible to communicate freely, I should tell him that I had perplexities which made the use of the Prayer-Book not as true to me as it once was, that I wanted time for quiet thought; that I should like to be silent for a little while—I would ask him to let me commit my charge to a curate till I could see my way more clearly. That would be better surely, than a resignation, painful not merely to your friends but injurious to the Church, and perhaps a reason for severe repentance afterwards. But I may be only increasing your puzzles by this suggestion. Of the fathers in God on earth I have no certainty. Of the Father in Heaven I can be quite certain. Therefore one of my hints may be worth nothing. The other is worth everything.’

Also to Rev. J. De la Touche.

'2 Brunswick Place, N.W., April 24, 1863.

Do not, I beseech you, suppose that my object is to lead you to Trinitarianism, or that I see in that or in any ism a deliverance from Atheism. A Trinitarian may be an Atheist as well as a Unitarian. I know numbers of Unitarians who are turning to God, the living God, from the Atheism which is in them as it is in you and me, although they may not have parted with the names and traditions of their childhood. I would not have them part with anything which they really learnt in their childhood. I would have them cling more intensely than ever to their conviction that there is a one God and that He is a Father. I would have them resolve that they will never let that go, and count the Trinitarian an enemy and a child of the devil who would deprive them of it.

And all I ask of you or any one who has been brought up a Churchman is not to let notions, or speculations, or theories of any kind hide from you this lesson which you learnt on your mother's knee, that God is not far from you and will hear your cry, let it be as weak a cry as it may. We do want, one and all of us, to be brought down, to learn, as you say, not how we may define God (define God! Repeat the words to yourself, and think how terrible they are), but that He is, and that He knows us if we know Him ever so little, and that He has been and is guiding us by strange ways out of our darkness into His light. This, then, is what we have forgotten, none more than the clergy; this is what He would teach us, that we may teach others and not be blind leaders of the blind.

You spoke of certain mystical phrases of St. Paul about Christ dwelling in us, &c., and said that perhaps you might accept them in a sense and so use the words of the Prayer-Book about the Divinity of Christ without directly outraging your conscience. What if those mystical phrases should some day flash into your mind as the expressions of the most practical, tremendous, blessed realities? What if God should even now be revealing His Son in you as He revealed Him in St. Paul? Yes! and for the reason St. Paul gives—That I might preach Him among the Gentiles. That I might tell men as men, "He is in you. He is the source of all the good deeds you have ever done, of all the good thoughts you have ever thought; He it is who has resisted all the evil that you have ever been tempted to do." May not we clergymen have been hiding this gospel from our fellow-creatures, preaching a certain job-divinity, certain things about Christ—not Christ Himself, the Head of every man, the Deliverer of mankind from sin, death, the grave, hell? And may not these doubts of yours, this questioning of yourself whether you have a right to believe anything, be the means of leading you to believe as you have never believed yet?

'I think you will find it so. I would ask this gift for you and for myself. We all need to have Christ revealed more to us, that we may know what we are without Him.'

To a Son, an undergraduate at Oxford.

'MY DEAREST E., 'Holder House, Dorking, April 16, 1863.

'I must look over my Juvenal and try whether I cannot get up some enthusiasm for him. I suppose I have done him some injustice. I used to think that he rather gloated over the evils which he denounced, and that he must have known them too well.

'I quite admit that the passages to which you allude ought to be taken as proofs that he retained a great sense of moral purity and admiration of goodness in the midst of all the abomination which he witnessed. For a man to do that in the age of Domitian was no light thing. It is one of the cheering proofs that God never leaves Himself without witness in any place or time, I must add in any man's heart; for though some may have listened to the protest within them against evil more than others, all had it and heard it. I agree with you also that Dryden's offences were very great. The contemplation of Charles's court is perhaps more terrible than that of the worst court of the worst emperor; the contrast of profession and practice is such a ghastly contrast. But yet take in the whole time, what a difference! what a growth! Juvenal's testimony is in this respect of infinite value. Indeed for history his satires are of indisputable worth, whatever their poetical worth may be. . . .'

He had had a long correspondence during the spring with Mr. Kingsley on Bishop Colenso's book on the Pentateuch, whilst Mr. Kingsley was preaching sermons on the Pentateuch. Mr. Kingsley's sermons had just appeared in a volume. To this and to the correspondence he refers in the next letter. The "correspondence with a clergyman" refers to letters exchanged with Mr. W. G. Cox, who curiously misconceived my father's drift, and has since repeatedly written as if my father was determined to shut his eyes to any possible mistakes in the Biblical narrative.

His contention was always that the Exodus was true history; that the mistakes, however numerous, did not affect its historical reality and veracity. Of the book of Genesis he quite accepted an expression of Dr. Pusey's that it was "the Divine Psalm of Creation." All the books seemed to him to be a revelation of the divine relation to man, not scientific manuals.

To Rev. C. Kingsley.

'Bredwardine, Hereford, August 11, 1863.

'I received your sermons shortly before I left London, and have had much delight in renewing my acquaintance with them, and in finding that there are so many of which I know nothing. The book must do great good. It made me wish that I had not darkened counsel by speaking any words on the subject; but I am glad enough that at last something has been spoken, which I trust numbers will hear.

'I have had a long (private) correspondence with a clergyman who writes against me in defence of Colenso, upon the nature and principles of evidence. He is a devout disciple of Cornewall Lewis, and believes in nothing but contemporary testimonies. I ask him how Sir G. Lewis came to believe that, with all the proofs which the Crimean War and the Indian Mutiny gave him of its utter untrustworthiness? If there is nothing to convince us but human testimony—nothing above it which enables us to test it—what power could it have over any human spirit? There is to me an overpowering evidence for the Resurrection, in the concurrence of the testimony through all nature, and in my own being, that Death must have been overcome, that it cannot be my master as my downward inclination leads me to think it is—with the testimony of straightforward honest men, “We saw Him after He was risen, though we thought the thing too good to be true.” But their testimony without the other could not affect me. I must cast it aside, let those who spoke it have been ever so honest. God’s testimony has made man’s credible. And so the most civilised part of the world has become a Christendom, and its power of doing any of the works of civilisation—of effecting any works which defy death and assume the victory of life—has been another testimony of the Resurrection, immeasurably stronger than the arguments of all divines and apologists.

‘I am glad you can speak so respectfully of Paley’s Evidences as you do in your Preface. I have a sneaking regard for him, as a good, tough North of England man, not spoiled by his cleverness as a lawyer. But I have been fighting against him all my days; I cannot help thinking he has done much to demoralise Cambridge, and to raise up a set of divines who turn out a bag infidel on Sundays to run him down, fixing exactly where he shall run, and being exceedingly provoked if he finds any holes and corners which they do not happen to know of. I do not mean that Paley was at all like these disciples; but I have a spite against him for their sakes.

‘This is a very beautiful place—I have seldom seen an English parsonage so beautiful. The Wye runs at the bottom of the garden; I like it better here than in the show parts.’

On March 9, 1863, Sir Thomas Acland wrote to my father an entreaty that he would speak out on the Colenso question. He had corresponded very little with my father for five and twenty years, and not much since "Subscription no Bondage" had been sent sheet by sheet to him to Oxford. He wrote:

'For more than a quarter of a century you have been helping Englishmen to see through the theories and systems which have been invented to prop up, restore, develope or narrow the ancient edifice of their National Church; and amidst ceaseless contumely and misrepresentation levelled against yourself, you have striven to teach, as Alexander Knox and S. T. Coleridge taught before you, that the Bible and the Church of England, in all their comprehensiveness, can best bear witness for their own truth, and for God's providence, against infidelity and Pantheism.'

He begged him to answer two questions.

- '1. Do not our faith in Christ, and our belief in the four Gospels as a real history, rest on grounds independent of the results of any critical inquiry into the authorship of the Pentateuch?
- '2. May we not continue to read the Pentateuch as the word of God, speaking of man and to man, without putting a forced construction on the plain meaning of the words, and without imposing fetters on the freedom of scientific or critical investigation in any matters which God has given us the power to inquire into?'

My father, who had been most unwilling to enter into the controversy for the reasons which have already appeared, replied in a series of letters which were published under the title of 'The Claims of the Bible and Science.'

What however is most interesting in the book from the biographical point of view, is this: Sir Thomas, who had known my father very intimately in the Oxford days, writes as if my father would of course agree with a scientific friend who assumed "Revelation" to be a "word once given" and therefore essentially unprogressive, while science is essentially progressive.

Now certainly it is clear from the letters of that very Oxford period that my father's reading of the word "Revelation" had been essentially the same in 1832 as it was in 1862. Nevertheless it is quite possible that my father himself used phrases in the Oxford days which he had ceased to use in 1862, though the process of the changes of expression had been so gradual that it is difficult to say when practically the earlier forms were dropped. At any rate, the books expressly on the Scriptures themselves, 'The Patriarchs and Lawgivers of the Old Testament,' 'The Prophets and Kings,' 'The Unity of the New Testament,' 'The Gospel of St. Luke,' 'The Gospel of St. John,' 'The Epistles of St. John,' 'The Revelation of St. John the Divine,' all are written in the belief that Christ "The Word," who was "in the beginning with God" and "was God," was throughout the Old Testament history educating each of the patriarchs, lawgivers, prophets, kings, by "a gradual unveiling and unfolding of Truth," and that the purpose of that history is "to exhibit facts which belong to other times as well as" to those whose history is recorded, "and laws and methods of a divine government which belong to all times." * More and more, therefore, he had come to look upon all expressions implying that the letter of the Bible is the word of God as denials of the living 'Word of God' of whom the Bible speaks.

Every discovery made by Mr. Darwin or Mr. Huxley was a discovery of a truth which had been true in itself ages before it was discovered. It could not therefore in itself be altered by any knowledge of it by men. He believed the thing itself to be, when discovered, just in so far as it was true, a revelation to man by God whether the discoverer accepted it in that sense or not. Therefore as the thing had been at first fixed and unchangeable from all time by the fiat of God, it seemed to him that every discovery of science was as much the result of an in-investigation of "a word once given" as any investigation of a sentence in the Bible. On the other hand the whole process of the history of the modern world and of the ancient seemed to him just as much the history of a progressive revelation as the history of the discoveries of science. It seemed to him that the emancipation of women, the abolition of slavery, the gradual substitution of law for arbitrary will, were all as much parts of the work of God the Deliverer, as the Exodus, but that the history of the Exodus was necessary to explain the central fact of the later history. The letters on 'The Bible and Science' are those referred to in the letter to Mr. Hutton.

* 'Prophets and Kings,' p. 473, footnote.

To Mr. Hutton.

'2 Brunswick Place, York Terrace, N.W. June 3, 1863.

"What you say of my letters is only too kind to me personally, and shows that I have bungled the whole subject terribly. But I think there is a petitio principii in your reasoning, however much excuse I may have given for it. You take for granted the ordinary definition of a miracle, which I, of course, dissent from altogether. I do not confess so many miracles—not a hundredth part so many—in the flight of the Israelites from Egypt as in the flight of the French from Moscow; i.e., if miracles mean improbabilities—departures from the ordinary course of events. I admit the history of the Exodus to be miraculous in this sense, that it is referred directly to God, and not to intermediate agents. That is just what I want it for as an explanation of the flight from Moscow, and all other flights which I read of in the Times and elsewhere. The question is whether it has less of the evidence of history than those flights, because it interprets them. That appears to be your position. If I had the account of such a defeat as Moscow in an old book like the Exodus, I might believe it, though I know nothing of whether the writer's name was Moses or Ségur. I must not believe the journey out of Egypt to be historical, for it speaks of God doing what I say, and the Bible says in every page, that no one else can do. It says that the righteous God, the Deliverer, the God of the whole earth, revealed in those acts that He is the doer of the things which are done on earth, and not Isis or Osiris. That is what I desire to know. Your historical evidence will not get rid of some unseen influence. It, only by destroying the book of Moses, gets rid of that unseen influence. Grote, of course, can call all early Grecian stories mythical because they presume a supernatural element. What does he effect? That word "myth" becomes his supernatural element, his unknown God. That is the spring of history, and all we have arrived at is that it springs out of a lie, and is likely, therefore, to end in one.'

Also to Mr. Hutton, after a reply to the above.

- '... The three aspects under which the Old Testament Scriptures were contemplated in the last century were:—
- '(1) The purely orthodox. The divine history is in its essence miraculous—i.e., it is an exception from the law of other histories. (2) The purely naturalistic. All the so-called miracles of Scripture may be explained into ordinary phenomena. (3) The spiritualistic (either in the Romanist or Methodist form). Miracles have not ceased. There are interferences now as there were of old.
- 'Strauss and the Mythical School subverted the second of these schemes. They showed that no records of human life can be content with merely naturalistic phenomena. There is always a dream of something transcendent. Follow that doctrine to its extreme in one direction and all history becomes based on falsehood. Follow it to its extreme in the other direction and you come to a true supernatural origin of all history. In the first case the Jewish story becomes one of the myths. In the second it becomes the interpretation of the myths. Suppose it to be the last, the purely orthodox, purely spiritualistic, purely naturalistic theories, each of which has been and still is unable to sustain itself, existing only to overthrow the other two; become reconciled in the principle that God is always working, that He exhibited His workings under particular conditions in the case of a certain people to explain the laws of His government; that miracles are not exceptions but manifestations. Were that principle once heartily accepted--none of us does heartily accept it—I do not think the standing up of the waters on the right hand or the left would seem to any of us more than the description of an actual phenomenon, as it presented itself to those who witnessed it—the most accurate they could give, leaving all interpretations of it open; but clear in this, that whatever was the agency, the Lord God who delivered slaves out of bondage was the cause. There is the point. It is a dreary commonplace to say There was a first cause. It is life, health, freedom to say He was the cause.'

CHAPTER XIV.

"When we have some opinion which we are not sure of, which we cannot rest in, yet which is dear to us because it is ours, then the impulse to crush those who will not accept it, who cannot see the force of our arguments, is very strong indeed.—F. D. M., Epistles of St. John, p. 322.

THE MEETINGS OF CLERGY AND LAITY AT MR. KEMPE'S RECTORY—1863—M. RENAN'S 'VIE DE JÉSUS'—THE DECISION OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL ON DR. LUSHINGTON'S JUDGMENT ON THE WORD "ETERNAL," AND ON VERBAL INSPIRATION—THE GREAT ALLIANCE OF DR. PUSEY AND THE 'RECORD'—MY FATHER'S PROTEST—"THE WORSHIP OF DIFFERENT GODS"—CORRESPONDENCE ON THE WORD "ETERNAL"—LETTER TO A MAN TROUBLED WITH DOUBTS—ON GOD AS THE REDEEMER OF THE WILL—OBJECTS TO REMOVAL OF ATHANASIAN CREED.

EVER since 1855 my father had attended, at intervals, the remarkable series of meetings which took place periodically, under the presidency of Mr. Kempe, at the St. James' Rectory. Clergy and laymen of all schools there met and discussed questions of common interest. My father, who adhered to Milton's and Selden's principle, as to the advantage of the interchange of thoughts of all kinds, believed that those meetings, under Mr. Kempe's wise and moderate guidance, had been of unspeakable service to the English Church in London, in removing prejudices, in clearing truth, and in bringing men together, not under a party bond. He often took part in discussions, and he himself several times introduced subjects.

On June 6th, 1861, he maintained the proposition "That the observance of the Lord's Day is grounded upon the fourth Commandment."

This was the first discussion in which he proposed a subject. It seems hardly worth while to give the propositions, which he defended, at various times, because, taken by themselves, and without record of the mode in which he dealt with them, they are apt to be misleading. In the years 1862 and 1863 his attendance was very frequent. It was probably at one of the meetings of this year that a scene occurred which left an impression so vivid upon all who witnessed it, that there is scarcely any incident of his life to which my attention has been more frequently drawn. The question under discussion was the subscription of the clergy. In the course of it a member of Parliament, a strict adherent of the religion of the hour, had been emphatically insisting upon the necessity of tightly tying down the clergy to their belief in the current dogmas of the day, and of his particular school, assuming throughout that just the creed of him and his friends was that which had always everywhere been held by all. Pointing out the shocks which this form of faith had been of late receiving from many quarters, and suggesting a doubt whether the clergy were really giving their money's worth of subserviency for the money paid to them, he had said: "Sometimes one would like to know what the clergy do believe nowadays!"

Every sentence had added fuel to the passionate indignation with which my father listened. It seemed to him just that claim to bind the clergy in the chains of Mammon at the chariot-wheels of public opinion, against which he believed that the Creeds, the Articles, the fixed stipends of the clergy, the order of Bishops as fathers-in-God, were so many protests. It seemed just that convenient getting rid of all belief in a living God, and safely disposing of Him under a series of propositions to be repeated at so much an hour which he looked upon as the denial of the day. His growing excitement became so manifest that a note was passed up to Mr. Kempe by one of those sitting by, begging Mr. Kempe to call next on Mr. Maurice. My father rose, as all those who saw him, say, "on fire." "Mr. — asks what the clergy believe in nowadays. I believe in God the Father Almighty," continuing the Apostles' Creed. Then he went on passionately to declare that because he so believed he was bound by his Orders to protest against all appeals to money, to the praise of men, to the bargaining of the market, to the current run of popular feeling, as so many direct denials of truth, so many attempts to set up idols in place of the teaching of the living God.

From all sides I have heard men say that it was one of the most striking things they had ever witnessed. Everyone felt as if the place was in a blaze. No one else felt in any condition to speak, and the discussion abruptly ended.

A certain number of the younger clergy, wishing for more freedom of discussion, formed afterwards a "Curates' Clerical Club," to which they asked my father and subsequently Dean Stanley to belong; no other incumbents of any kind being admitted. My father, however, did not there speak much, being anxious not to interfere with younger men.

To Mr. Hutton.

' 2 Brunswick Place, York Terrace, July 1, 1863.

' I had wished to read Renan before I wrote to you respecting your article on him. I have not been able to do so yet; I must therefore write without any knowledge but what I derive from the article itself. I feel with you that the book must be a critical one. I hope and believe that it will do the good you speak of to those who have been dreaming of such a life, and who will see what an artist with some of the highest qualifications of an artist, can make of it, and what it has been to Christendom when delivered by the most in-artistical of men. It ought to have a still more startling and terrible power for the orthodox who have been seeking for the living among the dead, and who have changed the Son of Man and the Son of God into the Founder of their religion. The sense of that ghastly substitution and of all its consequences—how the Gospel to mankind has been changed into the glorification of our faith, into the expectation of certain rewards for us (when I begin to doubt whether we must not be cast into outer darkness, like the Jews, that the light may shine out into the world)—overpowers me more than I can tell you. I wish to take part in this movement of the Bishop of London, believing that he is honest; entirely disliking to keep aloof from other men’s labours, and being utterly distrustful of any schemes of my own. But the horror of a great machinery to effect a spiritual object, and the fear that the words which go forth from all the new agents that are set to work may be words of death rather than life, make me pause. I trust one will be shown what one has to do, and that I shall be preserved from the temptation to indolence and despondency which is sometimes tremendously strong.

‘I hope you will review ‘Romola’ now that it is a complete book. It has impressed me very deeply. I think her Savonarola is the true man. I have seldom been more moved than by some of her hints respecting him in the latter part of the story. And her Tito, with the exception of his melodramatic exit, seems to me admirable throughout. Nor can I agree with Miss Wedgwood in considering Romola a modern lady. I think she has the dignity and grace at least of the revived antiquity of her age.’

To a Clergyman.

‘MY DEAR MR. —, ’

‘July 1, 1863.

I acknowledge as fully as any one can that commerce is an instrument in the Divine education and that if there is, lying at the root of Society, the recognition of the unity of men in Christ, the actual intercourse of men in different countries will bring out that belief into clearness and fullness, and remove the limitation and narrowness, which arise from the confusion between Christ Himself and our notions about Him. But that commerce is in itself apart from this principle any bond of brotherhood whatever—that it does not rather lead to the denial of all brotherhood, to murderous conflicts between labour and capital, to slavery and slave-trade—I know not how in the face of the most patent and recent facts it is possible to maintain. In the sixth century there were mobs in Constantinople partly to uphold blue or green in the circus, partly to put down Monophysite or Nestorian opinions. In Boston, in the nineteenth century, there were mobs to put down Mr. Garrison and the supporters of the negroes. You may if you please say that Theodora and her mobs were working in the supposed interests of theology, you must say also that the New England mobs were working in the supposed interest of commerce. That both were mistaken on their own grounds we are agreed; but that admission does not prove commerce to be a more uniting principle than theology.

“On the contrary, I am thoroughly convinced that all the scandals and falsehoods which are most reasonably complained of in modern theology, result from its mixture with commerce and the adoption of commercial principles as the groundwork of it. Mr. Bright said most truly at the meeting on Saturday that from the time the slave states adopted the doctrine that slavery was a Divine institution the question became a religious one, and a religious war was inevitable. That [assertion that slavery is a divine institution] is the most conspicuous and flagrant instance of the adoption in a money-worshipping community of a religion based on the acknowledgment of a God who is the enemy of Mammon into its [Mammon’s] service. But it is only an instance.

“Our English theology, popular as well as systematic, has been gradually reconstructing itself on the commercial or material bases; I find it the hardest thing possible not to adopt phrases in the pulpit and in writing which assume its habits and motives. The creeds have been the perpetual witnesses to me against this commercial theology, which is, I believe, helping to destroy our commercial as well as our personal morality. I agree with you that St. John’s words are in direct opposition to the inferences which have been deduced from the Athanasian Creed, and indeed from all the creeds. But St. John’s words have been made intelligible to me in their length and breadth by the creeds. The limitation of God’s favour to Christians arises, it seems to me, from the notion that a Christ who came into existence eighteen hundred years ago is the Head of a sect, not the Light of Light, the very God of very God. A simply humanitarian Christianity, whatever largeness it may affect in theory, will practically shut up humanity within the conceptions of the person who professes it. Humanitarians will therefore try to throw off Christianity as a restraint. But the vagueness and hollowness of a mere worship of abstract humanity will soon be palpable to them. What must follow, Comte has admirably illustrated in his own practice, though of course he could not foresee the developments of his scheme or his example. I am very far indeed from rejecting any sympathy which the disciples of Mr. Jowett feel for what I have said or hinted about the Eternal. I value it exceedingly. I only feared that the strong feeling in their excellent teacher of a hopeless distance between modern thought and the belief of the old days, would so far imbue them as to make them regard with some suspicion any pertinacious assertion of that which was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end.'

The next letter is written in reply to one in which Mr. Hutton mentioned the influence which M. Renan's books had had upon a Unitarian.

To Mr. Hutton.

'Lisselan, Clonakilty, Co. Cork, October 5, 1863.

'I have been shown lately so much of my own ignorance and of the Divine education which makes use of it, that I cannot but believe that all are led and drawn by paths which they know not, and which assuredly I cannot know. But to my weak vision it looks sad that Z. should so far forsake the principle from which he must have started—the old Unitarian confession of a Father—as to begin from the point at which it is most natural that a Frenchman bred in Jesuitism should begin—the belief in a human hero who could, like Renan himself, only conceive a God, and must of necessity have become an impostor when he said that he had come from God. The bridge between the real positive belief of the Unitarian in a distant Heavenly Father, and his equally positive belief in a man who called Himself His Son, may be hard to find—how hard no one can tell; but I did hope that a devout person like Z. would say resolutely, “Come what will, I must have a Father in Heaven. Come what will, that Father in Heaven must be the true God. I will count no man a hero who called himself a son of God if he were not that. I will count him a blasphemer as the Jews did; I will hold with them that he deserved stoning.” This, it seems to me, is the alternative which a true Unitarian should face, and that the attempt to evade it and to take up with the Gospel according to Renan, will only lead him to endless contradictions.

‘I should be very presumptuous and very inconsiderate if I denied that such a man as Renan, if he has in any degree risen from the worship of himself and of his own age to the belief of a heroic man who lived eighteen hundred years ago, may ascend to the confession of a God who was, and is, and is to come; I cannot doubt that that belief is latent in him and in every man now; that we are all living, moving, having our being in this God, and that He does reveal Himself to His creatures gradually, before He is revealed in His fulness of glory. But Englishmen, orthodox and Unitarians, both are taught of a Father first. It is the foundation of their lives. If they desert that foundation, I cannot think they will easily recover it. The intensity—I may say the agony—of this conviction if I had it habitually, as I have it sometimes, would be too much for me. It ought to make me spend whatever years or months are given to me on this earth in striving to let other men profit by some of the lessons—humiliating they may have been to me personally, more than I can tell any one—which have been brought home to me.

‘P.S.—What I have said connects itself closely with our old question about the Holy Spirit. The more I have felt that we must begin all our thoughts—or rather that our thoughts do begin from a Father, and that His Son our Lord is the ground of all the actual unity among men, without which there would be no families, nations, churches, humanity—the more have I been driven to the belief of a Spirit in whom the Father and Son are one, and in whom their unity becomes known to us, and the root of all conscious fellowship and self-sacrifice in us.’

Miss Wynn had written to give him a description of a three days’ demonstration in the Cathedral at Genoa, “to purge the town from the guilt of Renan’s impiety,” the result of which had been that “all the French copies of the book were sold and two Italian editions before the end of the week.”*

To Miss Williams Wynn.

‘2 Brunswick Place, December 22, 1863.

Besides the delight of getting a letter from you, the subject on which you wrote had a special interest for me. I had just been writing an article on Renan’s book for ‘Macmillan,’ and was anxious to know how it was working in the South. I had heard generally of its wide circulation in every province of France and Italy, and of the excitement among the ecclesiastics. I was not prepared for such mad proceedings as those which you describe, the effect of which must, of course, but increase its importance and popularity if they cannot diffuse it much more extensively. I do not enter into the feelings of your friend respecting the ‘Vie de Jésus,’ though I see what she means and recognise the piety of her own mind in the judgment she has formed of it. I can hope for good from it abroad in this way. I think the image of an actual living Christ has been so hidden under earthly disguises, that I can imagine Renan himself and many of his readers awaking up for the first time to the conviction, “There actually was such a Person as the

* ‘Miss Wynn’s Memorials,’ p. 316.

Evangelists speak of ! He did live in Palestine 1800 years ago. He is not merely a picture of our fancy." I think this ; and I think also that some earnest priests may begin to say to themselves, "Why is this so? What have we done to earn that this should be so? How can we begin from henceforth to declare a Christ who was born and died, but who rose and liveth evermore?" If the first thought—still more if the last—should be aroused, we may give God thanks that such a book has been permitted to come forth. We may perceive that He is justified even now in His doings as we know He will be hereafter. But when I look at the book itself, I can see nothing but plausible and graceful falsehood. M. Renan's Jesus is not the one whom your friend or you have revered. He is a charming Galilean with a certain sympathy for beautiful scenery and an affectionate tenderness for the peasants who follow him ; but he is provoked to violence, impatience, base trickery, as soon as he finds his mission as a reformer unsuccessful. The Frenchman bred amidst pious frauds, calls him the most delightful and wonderful of men, who practices innocent artifices, resorts to thaumaturgy unwillingly, but when he does resort to it is guilty of wilful imposture beside the grave of his friend. We in England should say he was a horrible liar and audacious blasphemer. We should pronounce the Jews right in the judgment which they passed upon him. To me the book is detestable, morally as well as theologically. It has brought to my mind, as I have said in my paper on it, that wonderful dream of Richter's in which Jesus tells the universe, "Children, you have no Father." For the God whom He calls His Father is one who cannot exist, or how would He dare to trifle with His name? Jesus is for M. Renan one of the highest of mortal creatures, though far below our standard in the nineteenth century. He only pretended to be the Son of God, though he had better right to the name than most. He has been dead for 1800 years. What God have we but Necessity or Nothingness? "Children, you have no Father," is the message which Renan is sending from one end of Europe to the other. How ought he to stir us up to ask on what ground we may proclaim the opposite tidings to all human beings in all corners of the earth.'

He contributed an article on Renan's 'Vie de Jésus' to 'Macmillan's Magazine' for Christmas, 1863.

To Mr. Hutton.

'December 31, 1863.

'I was much delighted with what you said of my article. I felt deeply while I was writing it, how much Renan's conception of Christ, which has given such scandal to the orthodox abroad and at home, endorses all their falsehoods and all their despair; how naturally we were drifting into that very dream of One who is dead, though Paul and his fellow-fanatics and impostors affirmed Him to be alive; how Christmas itself threatened to be the celebration of one born 1860 years ago in Palestine, and fairly out of the way of all popes and emperors in our days.'

To a Son.

'MY DEAREST E.,

'February 8, 1864.

'... Your friend's feeling about Renan I can understand. A person, even a person who tells lies, is better than a mere shadow or dream. Renan's Christ, I said in my article, might seem to him a great ascent from the mere picture or doll which he had connected with the name. But he has shown conclusively that an honest person cannot be associated with the name who is not a divine person, who is not in very deed a son of God. The Christ of the Evangelists is to me the most completely personal of all persons, not if He could be separated from the supernatural element, but because He cannot be. Renan takes the supernatural out of the Gospels. He cannot take it out of his own life. He is surrounded by it, every word he speaks, every thought he thinks, bears witness of it. The New Testament explains why it is so, why it must be so. Renan says, "Oh, if I could but get that reduced to a mere natural book, how easily I could believe it." He is utterly mistaken; he could not believe it, no one could believe it then. It would be the idlest, silliest, most incoherent of fictions.* I say of his Jesus, Incredulus odi. It makes demands on my credulity such as no romance I ever read makes. It outrages my conscience as no Jesuit falsehood or scheme of falsehood outrages it. I find in it the very root of Jesuitism; the Jesus of the Jesuits.

'But I know that the book has not presented itself in this way to all readers. I shall be very glad to make your friend's acquaintance and to hear what he has to say about it. . . .'

On February 8, 1864, the Privy Council decided against Dr. Lushington's judgment the appeal in the cases of Williams v. The Bishop of Salisbury, and of Wilson v. Fendall.

The Judicial Committee consisted of the Lord Chancellor Westbury, Lord Cranworth, Lord Chelmsford, Lord Kingsdown, while the two Archbishops and the Bishop of London (Tait) were assessors. Since the pleadings had been terminated six months had passed, whilst the wording of the judgment was being determined. The judges had been selected solely on the principle of taking the names of greatest authority upon the panel, all either had held or might have held the great seal. Two were Liberals, two were Conservatives. Their judgment was unanimous. The Bishop of London concurred absolutely. The Archbishops gave a partial assent. To quote the brilliant historical article in which the 'Edinburgh Review' summed up the facts:

"No one who was present can forget the interest with which the audience in that crowded Council-chamber listened to sentence after sentence as they rolled along from the smooth and silvery tongue of the Lord Chancellor, enunciating with a lucidity which made it seem impossible that any other statement of the case was conceivable, and with a studied moderation of language which at times seemed to border on irony, first the principles on which the judgment was to proceed, and then the examination, part by part and word by word, of the three charges that remained, till at the close not one was left, and the appellants remained in possession of the field."

* This letter has the additional interest that when 'Ecce Homo' was published my father understood it as an attempt to bring out just that which in this letter he is insisting on: the intensely personal character of Christ if He were the Eternal Son of God, and the inconsistency of any other representation.

The most important points thus decided on by the Privy Council were those of "the verbal inspiration of the Scriptures," and "the hopeless torments of future punishment." When the prosecutors found that they had failed in establishing their views on these subjects as binding on the clergy, a panic followed with very noteworthy results. To quote from the same 'Edinburgh' article as to the extent to which party leaders had by Bishop Wilberforce's influence been drawn together.

"By the skilful guidance of the mysterious oracle, which spoke through the lips of our respected contemporary the 'Quarterly Review,' " [i.e. in December 1861] "the hypothesis of a close alliance founded on a common antipathy to persons whom both alike dreaded or disliked, had marvellously succeeded. And this bond of union, which had been formed in a moment of triumph, was tightened by the sense of the common misery of unexpected defeat, such as proverbially unites the strangest bed-fellows."

A letter from Dr. Pusey, addressed to the Record, appeared in its columns immediately after the judgment. Soon afterwards, "amidst much confusion and disorder," a meeting hastily called in the music-hall at Oxford, appointed "seven clergymen from the two aggrieved parties" to draw up a "Declaration of Faith." This was sent to every clergyman in England, with an entreaty that he would "for the love of God" sign it. Every influence "personal and social, spiritual and temporal," that could be brought to bear by two highly organised parties possessed of nearly all the patronage of the Church, was set to work. Young clergymen were told that whether they did or did not believe the words of the declaration, yet if they did not sign it their future career would be destroyed. Evidence as to these facts soon poured in upon my father. For the moment it seemed likely to be the most unpopular thing that a man could do to stand out against the panic. Especially for my father to do so, made it certain that his views would be confused by the party papers with those of men from whom he widely differed, and that his anxiety to avert the triumph of any combination of parties would be represented as a wish for the triumph of a party of which he had never spoken, except quâ party to denounce it. His course could not therefore be doubtful. The declaration was so worded that whilst it appeared only to involve a profession of belief in what few clergymen could deny, it in fact committed whoever signed it to a particular view of the doctrines referred to in it. About the same time, and under the excitement produced by the Privy Council decision, the Oxford Convocation had again, because of his theological opinions, refused to pay Mr. Jowett the salary for his work as Greek professor, even though in this instance, as a matter of policy, Dr. Pusey and Mr. Keble had recommended the grant. On March 9th my father wrote to the Times to complain of the vagueness of the declaration. A correspondence with Dr. Pusey followed. Dr. Pusey, in his final letter declared that he and my father "worshipped different Gods."

To this my father replied on March 15th as follows:

To the Editor of 'The Times.'

'SIR,

'... My reasons for refusing to sign the new Declaration of Faith are these:

- '1. An irresponsible, self-elected committee has no right to frame a new test for the Church of England.
- '2. This test is not an honest one. It means more than it says. If a man does not accept it, he is told that he denies the inspiration of the Scriptures, that he rejects the Word of God, that he will not receive the express declaration of the Spirit. If he does sign it he is told that he has committed himself to a condemnation of the decision of the Privy Council; to a special notion about inspiration which I, for one, believe to be dishonourable to the Word of God; to the notion that God condemns men to everlasting sin, which I, for one, hold to be an accursed notion.

‘3. Because the adjuration prefixed to the declaration that “for the love of God” we would put our names to it, received a very lucid explanation from the recent decision of the Oxford Convocation.

‘It means, “Young clergymen, poor curates, poor incumbents, sign, or we will turn the whole force of religious public opinion against you. Sign, or we will starve you! Look at the Greek Professor. You see we CAN take that vengeance on those whom we do not like. You see that we are willing to take it, and that no considerations of faithful and devoted services will hinder us.” This is what is called signing “for the love of God.” I accept Dr. Pusey’s own statement, tremendous as it is. I say that the God whom we are adjured to love under these penalties is not the God of whom I have read in “the Canonical Scriptures,” not the God who declares that He abhors robbery for burnt-offering.

‘In my turn I will implore and even adjure. I call upon the richer incumbents of London and of all parts of England, upon the learned members of cathedral establishments, upon those in the Universities who are not yet pledged, to protect their younger and poorer brethren from this moral force, a phrase which means to these theologians, as it meant to the Chartists, the threat of physical force. I call upon the bishops—not only upon those who have made themselves responsible for the whole or any part of the Privy Council decision, but upon all who are not prepared to surrender their own functions to any self-created committee—to say whether they think that the Church requires a new test, whether they think that we are obliged “for the love of God” to subscribe one.’

The response to the two appeals is too remarkable to be omitted.

The power of the party leaders of the two great parties in the Church cordially united had been strained to the utmost. The wording of the declaration was so loose that the Bishop of St. Davids in subsequently denouncing the whole scheme declared that he could have signed it himself. Many clergymen announced at the time of signing that they only did so on the understanding that by signing they did not wish to contravene the judgment. Many of these, as the Edinburgh Reviewer put it, "wished to reaffirm as the doctrine of the Church the opinion of verbal inspiration, and of the hopeless torments of future punishment, which the judgment had declared not to be the doctrine of the Church, and yet they did not venture to say distinctly what that opinion was." With these conditions, pressed as the document was upon every clergyman throughout the land, in all less than half had signed, and the classes to whom my father had specially appealed to abstain were conspicuous by their absence. Of thirty English deans eight only had signed. Of the professors of Oxford whence the address issued, nine only; of those of Cambridge, one only; of all the headmasters of great schools, two only; of the contributors to the 'Bible Dictionary,' selected necessarily as the most learned men in such matters in the land, five only out of fifty had signed in a matter "so peremptorily requiring a knowledge of the Bible." London stood out in marked contrast to the country districts, only one clergyman in three having signed. When the address was presented to the Upper House of Convocation only four bishops were found to be willing to receive it.

Finally the document, with its eleven thousand signatures, received its quietus from a sentence of Bishop Thirlwall, who, according to Bishop Wilberforce's biographer, was at this time always acting in full accord with Wilberforce: "I consider them in the light of a row of figures preceded by a decimal point, so that however far the series may be prolonged, it can never rise to the value of a single unit."

In the second week of March, Mr. Lyttelton had written a letter to the Spectator, complaining of the tone of that paper in regard to the belief in endless punishment and incidentally had assumed that my father's belief in the meaning of the word "eternal" was deduced from a forced construction of a single text. To this letter my father thus replies :

To the Hon. and Rev. W. H. Lyttelton.

'2 Brunswick Place, York Terrace, N.W., March 14, 1864.

'I may, perhaps, be pardoned for writing to you respecting your letter in the Spectator of Saturday. If I had anything to complain of in your tone of speaking, so far as I am concerned, I might have kept silence, for I feel no inclination to enter into personal controversies. But I do not think that, at any time, one ought to shrink from the defence of principles in which the life of the Church and the glory of God are involved. And I believe that I should be a traitor not only to my calling as Christ's minister, but to those who have encouraged me most while they were on earth to lay hold on eternal life, and who know better what it is now, if I did not strongly assert that it is not an idle paradox to hold that that life is the life of the eternal God which the eternal Son of God manifested to us, and into which by His eternal Spirit He would lead us. If this is a paradox, it is one which I have learnt from all the good men and women with whom I have conversed or whose books I have read ; it seems to me the paradox of the Bible ; it is the paradox which, if I may not utter, I wish that my tongue may cleave to the roof of my mouth, for then I have not a Gospel to men.

'In your ingenious illustration of my absurdity, you seem to intimate that the epithet "eternal" has just the same relation to time which the epithet 'French' has to place. If you do not say that, the comparison which is meant to demolish me has, so far as I see, no relevancy at all. If you do mean this, are not you falling into what most would think a great paradox? Does not every one naturally oppose eternal to temporal? Does not St. Paul directly, formally oppose them in a passage of the most practical character, a passage which expresses his profoundest moral and theological convictions? That we are not consistent in opposing them is what I complain of.

‘That we make eternity a very very long time, is what I have always affirmed to be the great contradiction of the religious world, the contradiction from which the New Testament (or rather the Spirit who spoke in the writers of the New Testament, and would open to us the meaning of the New Testament) would deliver us if we did not prefer our own notions, derived from earthly things, to the Divine illumination.

‘When you pooh-pooh the literal construction of St. John’s words, “This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and that men loved darkness rather than light because their deeds were evil”—when you say that light is not God’s highest reward, and darkness the unutterable curse—you seem to me to show why you refuse to take eternal life in St. John’s sense, and in the sense, as I contend, of all the writers in the New Testament. That a certain prize called Happiness is to pay us for being righteous and for a good life, and that righteousness and the Divine life are not themselves the ends which Christ sets before us, the highest blessings we can seek—this seems to me the terrible confusion which has come to us from mixing partly the philosophy of Aristotle, partly the philosophy of the money market, with the message of the Son of God. If to dwell in light is not the infinite blessing, if to dwell in darkness is not the infinite horror, I have read the Bible all wrong, and the people who have taught me most have deceived me most; they must be disappointed now of what they longed for below; I know nothing to long for or to bid others long for. If you think my objection to the popular theory of hell turns exclusively upon this “paradox” about the word eternal, you are greatly mistaken. Punishment, the Bible teaches me, is always God’s protest against sin, His instrument for persuading men to turn from sin to righteousness. If punishment is to endure for ever, it is a witness that there are always persons on whom God's discipline is acting to raise them out of sin. Modern theology—Dr. Pusey's theology—teaches that God sentences men to sin, to go on sinning more and more for ever and ever. I hold that that is to say, that He is not punishing, that He gives over punishing. I stand to the letter—the ipsissima verba of Christ. They translate them into other and directly opposite words.

P.S.—I have not alluded to your censure of the Editor of the Spectator; in part I agree with it. I am as sensitive to any lowering of the idea of hell or heaven as you can be. I am as jealous for the honour of the clergy. But I cannot deny that we are the authors of the irreverence which we condemn in other men. We have reduced the Gehenna of the Bible into a heathen Tartarus. We have turned the heaven of the Bible into something less real, less hopeful, than a heathen Elysium. God may be teaching laymen to scoff at our counterfeits that they may discover the meaning of His truth. But oh! has He not a lesson also for us? Can you read the Gospels and not perceive that it is not against publicans and harlots, but against Scribes and Pharisees, the rulers of the religious thought of the day, that He is denouncing the damnation of hell? And why? Because they confounded the good God with the Evil Spirit. Are we in no danger of doing the like?’

Also to the Hon. and Rev. W. H. Lyttelton.

‘2 Brunswick Place, York Terrace, N.W., March 18, 1864.

I was led in my correspondence with the Principal of King's College to dwell, perhaps too much, on the words, “This is life eternal, that they may know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent,” partly because they have been mightier words to me than almost any in the Bible, partly because the awfulness of the prayer in which they occur, gives them a profound and infinite significance and connects them with the whole mystery of our Lord's sacrifice and death. But I did refer, even in that correspondence, to another passage which expresses with a divine simplicity the whole meaning of the Gospel which St. John had preached to the world, a passage that he evidently regarded as containing his final message to his children at Ephesus.

“That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the Word of life. For the life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and shew unto you that ETERNAL LIFE, which was with the Father and was manifested unto us.”

“Let my words be as muddy and as unintelligible to plain persons as they may, here is a celestial clearness; here is an inspired old man speaking in the accents of a child. And what does he say? That our Lord who was visible at the very most for three years to the disciples who walked with Him on earth, manifested to them the Eternal Life which was with the Father, and that He sent them to declare to men who had never seen Christ in the flesh, this Eternal Life, “that they might have fellowship with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ.”

“Now supposing there are certain things which we have a right to call temporal, things which are subject to the incidents of change and of growth, and whether necessarily or not, of decay; suppose there are other things which may be truly called eternal, which are subject to no such incidents; supposing Righteousness, Truth, Love, were such eternal things into which a man may enter, with which he may have fellowship, which he may apprehend more and more day by day, but which are in themselves unchangeable—St. John's words would be intelligible, and they would indeed be a Gospel to mankind: “Righteousness, Truth, Love are the very life of God, of Him who was, and is, and is to come. His Son who is one with them has manifested this Eternal Life to us. His acts done in those few years reveal to us His Father, who in Him is our Father. He invites us to partake of that life, to enter into it, to show it forth." But suppose eternal life means only a life, or rather happiness, prolonged through an indefinite series of future ages, is it not utterly strange and monstrous language to talk of that life as manifested, and manifested by the Man of Sorrows?

' You do me the justice to believe that I do not wholly deny the importance of that which does not fall under the head of spiritual enjoyment and spiritual misery. Deny it, why should I? If we talk of a few years (threescore and ten for the most part) ending our relations with Time, and then an eternity beginning, I can conceive an excuse for the language of preachers about the worthlessness of the things of time (the things of this earth); language which inspires laymen with so much disgust because they see nothing in our conduct which shows that we believe it to be true. But if eternal things are not future things more than they are present, more than they are past, if they are distinct in kind from temporal things—each may have its own honour, they may be inseparably linked together in the nature of man. If Christ has taken a body, if He has eaten and drunk, if He has suffered and died, if He has redeemed that body from death, everything appertaining to our bodies must be sacred. Our senses must be glorious as well as our spirits. They must have their own appropriate functions and occupations now and always. They must be most wonderful instruments in our education. And this universe which God has made must be in every part of it calling for human investigation. The Spirit of God must be awaking men to study the secrets of it. Whilst you distinguish the Eternal and the Temporal, you can see their relation to each other: you can feel what a blessing appertains to each. When eternity is merely a vast interminable future, it swallows up everything. Yet there is no joy in contemplating it. People shrink from our negative heaven only one degree less than from our hell. They seem different parts of the same vague abyss. Life in one sense is absent from both. Death they think rules in both.

“And what gives either reality? What makes one an object of hope, the other of dread? Men are awakened to the sense of their own evil—of a tormenting self. They hear of a Saviour to whom they can fly from themselves, of a Father who is seeking after them. They begin to believe in an eternal home in a Father’s house, and that from which they fly is hell; the torment of the worm in their conscience, the misery of being left alone with themselves. That is the eternal death from which they cry to be delivered. They take no measure of its continuance. It is with them. It is now. It darkens all the past, it throws its horror over the future. “Oh, God, Thou hast been a refuge from it throughout all generations. Thou wilt be our refuge from it throughout the generations to come. Punish us as Thou wilt. Punish us, if it pleases Thee to do so, for ever. But keep us from this death. Raise us out of it. Unite us to that Life which is in Thee, and which, except in Thee, we can never possess.”

“I have felt—I do feel more every day—that in proclaiming this life to men, in warning them of this death, I am speaking to something which can answer me, and which, if it never hears my voice, will one day hear the voice of the Son of Man and live. When I use the other dialect, I feel, as certainly, that I am addressing a confused, cowardly dread of punishment—a servile dread of God which the Son of Man does not own, which is part of our evil nature that fights against Him, and that He will destroy. You wish that I would adapt my lessons to simple people. If there is anything in them which men in smock-frocks, which pure-minded women cannot take in, I would fain get rid of that. But I do not think they will understand me better if I talk of an eternity a parte post, and an eternity a parte ante, if I exchange the language of St. John for that of the schools. I know we must do that, and mix the school jargon in due proportions with the rhetoric of Exeter Hall to escape the charges of mistiness and mysticism from religious newspapers and coteries. But a man who is near sixty may be well hardened to those charges. The sacrifice to propitiate the men who deal them out is greater than I can honestly incur.'

The following letter is a very representative one. My father, among the many people who wrote to him for help and guidance, sometimes encountered men who seemed to him to have made no earnest effort to face difficulties and to arrive at truth, but merely to wish to entrap him into arguments about matters for which they cared nothing, or for which they only cared as logical dilemmas. In all such cases there was no satisfaction to be had from him. Sometimes he afterwards found out that he had been mistaken. The following is written under the latter circumstance, after he had become convinced that his correspondent was in earnest.

To ———

'MY DEAR SIR,

'March 15, 1864.

'I am fully convinced that what you say is true. I have no doubt that you are in earnest. Will you let me say something more which is true from my lips if it could not be from yours?

'I believe God has made you in earnest, that he has made you discontented with mere words and phrases which did not mean anything to you, that He is stirring you up to feel after foundations upon which you may rest for ever.

'If any one told me that I had no right to say so, because you have given up your belief in Christ and in God, I should answer him, "What! sir, and have you given up your faith in Christ and in God? If you have not, you must suppose that God cares for every man whether or not that man cares for Him, is seeking after every man whether or not that man is seeking after Him. You must also suppose that there is a Son of Man who is near to every man, who is his Lord and Brother, who died for him, and who lives for him. Yes! and you must also believe that if my Christianity, or your Christianity, or any man's Christianity stand between you or me or him and God, who is our Father, Christ who is our Brother, He will sweep that Christianity away. He will set you or me or him upon another kind of search, a weary one it may be, but far more hopeful, more godly, than acquiescence in anything, which may only have concealed an unfathomable Atheism."

'Having said this, you will not, I trust, suspect me of disliking you for throwing off conventionalisms and speaking to me as a man to a man. What I feared at first, was that you were speaking to me in conventionalisms, liberal conventionalisms, which are very nearly—not quite—as hateful to me as orthodox conventionalisms; nearly, because they are not more real; not quite, because they do not profane and counterfeit as many sacred and eternal verities.

'When I had convinced myself that you were not indulging a boyish delight in substituting the hollow phrases that have been coined in our nineteenth-century mint, and that have been put in circulation to replace others, much defaced, that had the stamp of an earlier day, when I saw that you cared for truth, and would die to find it, even though you doubt whether there is any to be found, I could respect you and claim fellowship with you, and desire heartily that I might—not teach you—but give you a hint of the way in which I have been and still am learning. If ever I can be useful to you in that way it will be a very great satisfaction to me.'

To the Dean of Westminster.

'Gonville House, Palace Road, Upper Norwood, April 19, 1864.

'MY DEAR STANLEY,

'I went with Henry de Bunsen to see Garibaldi at the "Palace" yesterday, and through Grove's favour we were close to him. The sight was a very cheering and glorious one.

'I would have given much that Kingsley had not got into this dispute with Newman. In spite of all apparent evidence, I do believe that Newman loves truth in his heart of hearts, and more now than when he was an Anglican. Kingsley's 'Teutons and Romans,' notwithstanding the contempt which the Saturday Review—and I am sorry to say the Spectator—have heaped upon it, seems to me a most delightful and instructive book, specially good for the Cambridge men, and really explaining much which he thinks inexplicable in Newman.'

To a Lady.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

'May 4, 1864.

'I said some words to you yesterday which it has grieved me to recollect, because I fear they gave you pain. They were spoken, as my words generally are, about myself and against myself. I feel all the incapacity to believe which you speak of. In my case I can only describe it as reluctance to believe, even when it is mixed with ever so much desire. I therefore speak of belief as having to do with the will. The bondage I groan under is a bondage of the will. And that has led me to acknowledge God as emphatically the Redeemer of the will. It is in that character He reveals Himself to me; I could not think of God at all as the God, the living God, if I did not regard Him as such a Redeemer. But if of my will, then of all wills: sooner or later I am convinced He will be manifested as the Restorer, Regenerator—not of something else, but of this—of the fallen spirit that is in us.

'To believe that the sun shines, that I can walk across the street, that I know any friend or relation, that I can understand the words they speak, this is often hard work. But He who enables me to believe so far, can enable me to believe anything that is true. And I say again, if me, why not every one? What is there to distinguish me from every one else? I become dark and devilish when I do not confess myself human. And if I do, what is that but saying I take my ground with all my race, with every fellow-creature. God saves me because He saves them. And surely there is time enough in the infinite ages for Him to show that what we have seen in the faintest way to be true here, is actually absolutely eternally true.'

To the same Lady.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

'June 6, 1864.

'It is very kind in you to trust me, as you have done, with the thoughts that are tormenting you. I cannot tell you how much I prize your confidence, or how unworthy I feel of it. I see by your letter that I have made you think, as I have many others, that private and personal griefs are indifferent to me, and that I should only dismiss them with some general statements of God's goodness. I have given plentiful cause for that suspicion. If I could tell you how in former days I awakened it in some very near to me, and how, in spite of a very strong affection upon their side, it did lead to an estrangement between us which, now that it cannot be healed, I perceive far more clearly and keenly than when it took place, you would see that I was not wholly without the experience which might fit me to enter into yours, though the hardness of my character might be a disqualification! Alas! such estrangements have been far too familiar facts in my history. I have much more to reproach myself for in them than you have in your case; still I can understand better than you may fancy the wish that one could bring it under the head of a sin, that one could be, as you say, actually a prodigal to return to one's Father. That is a very deep and subtle temptation. I think most of us must have passed through it, and must be assailed by it very often now. And it is that, dear friend, which leads me into the sort of language which easily becomes vague, and which often sounds cold and general. I have found it so impossible to discriminate for others, even for myself (as some endeavour to do, and to a certain extent may succeed in doing), between that in us which we may justify, and that which we must condemn, between that we may merely complain of, and that of which we must repent, between the repentance that is sincere and is not, between physical pain and spiritual pain, —that I have said, “God understands these things; I do not. He can and will perfectly justify that which is good in you and me, and condemn that which is bad. He knows physical evil and moral evil, and is not indifferent to either.” I have used this language, and by it have got credit with very kind people for being much more devout than I am, and, what far more than compensates such undeserved praise, am suspected by those whom I should like to help, of a wish to put them off with generalities. But if you knew that I said these things, not because I want to appear wiser or better than other people, but because I have really been shown by very bitter humiliations that I have no light whatever but that which shines upon them, you would perceive that you might tell me of any murmurings, confusions, inversions, contradictions of mind and heart, and that with those at least, if not with your better moods, I might be at home.

“And still I am inclined to go back to my old language, and say, Complain on. Do not attempt to analyse your feelings. Do not try to find out how much of them is excusable, how much not. God gives repentance, we do not make it. We may tell Him as well as we can what a mess and labyrinth we are in. We may at least say, Guide us through it and out of it. And I do say, believing it, that these intricate labyrinths through which friends try to lead us, and in which they involve us more hopelessly, are an education; that they do bring us out of our Atheism as nothing else does; that they make us understand we must have a guide somewhere and not far from us, that out of the despair which they produce in us comes a strange immeasurable hope, a hope which comprehends all within it, not vaguely, but distinctly, a hope which the incapacity to sever ourselves from them makes necessary, a hope that God will and must reveal Himself and that the revelation will and must be for our good and for theirs. How does the leaden weight of Death, the sense of his power over us and over the universe, the recollection of millenniums of deaths, overpower all mere argument for a resurrection! What an argument for one grows out of these facts! I am compelled by them, when I feel that they are death to me, to believe in a risen Christ, in a conqueror of Death, for all. I cannot separate my destiny from that of my kind. I must hope for it, or sink into an unfathomable hopelessness for myself.

‘Now, dear friend, the sight of that “ebbing life” which you speak of must be to you, should be to you, more than general considerations about life and immortality. It surely makes all such wearisome to you. Facts always make theories wearisome. But some special fact may be and generally is our stepping-stone to every true discovery. It may force us to seek, to rest in that, which is deeper than hell, higher than heaven. The greatest harm I have done people, perhaps you, is that I have too much quelled their questions as if I had a recipe for setting them at rest. What I would do now is to say to each one, Light must and will arise which will scatter all darkness. That is true. Wait for that. It will be for —— and for you. To expect it for him and for yourself and for all, is a deliverance like no other. God Himself will day by day kindle it more as you more defy that which contradicts it.’

The following letter was written to a young clergyman who had asked my father’s opinion as to the desirability of making an attempt, during the sitting of the Commission on Ritual, to remove the Athanasian Creed from the Church Service.

‘2 Brunswick Place, York Terrace, June 25, 1864.

‘If I entirely agreed with you in your objections to the Athanasian Creed, I should think that there was no set of men so unlikely to consider them fairly and seriously as the new Ritualistic Commission. If you brought the question before them, a resolution not to entertain it would be probably the single one in which the heterogeneous elements composing the Commission would unite. You would certainly take nothing by that motion.

- ‘Supposing I disapproved of the Creed, I should cease to read it without waiting for the permission of any bishops or any Commission. If I were called to account, I should give my reasons, not doubting that I should do good by causing the subject to be ventilated. In general there would be no interference by any ecclesiastical authority with persons omitting the Creed. They have abundance of precedents. If the people asked questions about it the minister would be glad of the opportunity of answering them.
- ‘I do not act in this way myself. (1) Because I believe the Creed asserts some great principles which are not asserted so clearly elsewhere. (2) Because I count it an advantage to be able to explain to my congregation why I do not consider the true and simple meaning of the words that meaning which is given them by the popular opinion of our day.
- ‘I cannot expect men of any school to concur with me in these opinions. I seem ridiculous to all disciples of Jowett, a heretic and a wilful liar to all disciples of Pusey, when I insist that the word eternal must always bear that force which we give it when we connect it with God; and that an eternity which is merely future is a contradiction. But as this belief is associated in my mind with all that I read about eternal life in the New Testament, it must be a very sacred one to me, and one which must enter into every part of the Gospel I deliver to my congregation, however strange and silly a crotchet it may appear to Broad or to High Churchmen.
- ‘Now it does seem to me that the Athanasian Creed by its direct words (the Father Eternal, the Son Eternal, and the Holy Ghost Eternal) forces this meaning upon us as that which must govern and determine the use of the adjective in all cases. When, therefore, the word is afterwards applied to death or to punishment I hold that those who accept the Creed are bound to apply this sense to eternity, whatever other men may do.
- ‘For them to connect it with mere endless torture hereafter, and not with the loss of the presence of the Eternal God (without reference to the time during which any man might suffer that loss), is in my judgment unreasonable.

‘Pusey and his school do that avowedly because they are afraid to lose the beneficial influence of terror on the minds of evil men or heretics; I deny that they do it because they adhere to the literal construction either of the Creed or of Scripture.

‘You see it is not that I can find a meaning in the Creed which makes it tolerable to me; it is that the Creed itself gives forth that meaning to me, and helps to correct an abuse of language which I believe is fatal to theology, and which links itself with all the vulgar notions and base feelings which are undermining morality. You say, that “People generally take it in the other, which you deem the gross and evil sense.” Just so; that we are agreed upon. And you may be right that this is a stronger reason for banishing the Creed from our services than any which I can give for retaining it. I do not care. If it is taken away, perhaps it may bear the testimony which I hold that it does bear, more strongly when we can contemplate it more impartially. But whilst I retain these convictions I should be very inconsistent if I took part in any movement for expelling it. I believe its very vehemence has been a protection against the doctrine which it was supposed to uphold.’

CHAPTER XV.

“Narrow is the path of Truth;
Duty threads twixt chasms her way.”

Prince Consort's Life.

SEPTEMBER, 1864—THE COLENZO QUESTION IN THE LAW COURTS AND IN SOUTH AFRICA—LETTER OF ADVICE FOR SOUTH AFRICA—LETTER TO STANLEY ON SUBSCRIPTION, EXPRESSING NATURE OF HIS OWN CHANGE OF VIEW—‘THE NAME IN BAPTISM’—‘THE DIVINE CHARITY’ IN LETTERS TO MR. KINGSLEY—LINCOLN’S ASSASSINATION AND ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF A THEOCRACY—THE DIVINE WORD—MR. HUGHES AS MEMBER FOR LAMBETH—ART AND SCIENCE IN RELATION TO ROMANISM AND PROTESTANTISM—EXPLAINS TO MR. KINGSLEY THE HISTORY OF HIS VIEWS ABOUT SUBSCRIPTION.

IN September Sir Edward Strachey invited my father to meet Bishop Colenso at his house. The following letter gives my father’s reasons for refusing the invitation.

To Sir E. Strachey.

‘September 18, 1864.

‘Your proposal is most kind, and your way of putting it kinder still. I will answer with the frankness you desired. There has been an estrangement between Colenso and me since he came to England. I think that the Bible is the great deliverer from ecclesiastical bondage—the great protestor for human freedom. That is the maxim I have always tried to maintain. When he took up exactly the opposite maxim, when he treated the Bible as itself the instrument of our slavery, and seemed to think that to throw it off would be the great step to emancipation, I felt that he was giving up the ground to the Bishop of Oxford and Dr. Pusey. I saw nothing before us but that fanaticism against criticism, that effort to bind a human tyranny upon us, which these last few years have developed. I do not say that I may not have been faithless, that I may not often have been unkind. But I had a deliberate conviction that I owed this duty to the Church and to the cause of liberty. If I identified myself with those who were called liberal thinkers, who seemed to be, and, in many respects were, pleading for the rights of the clergy and the rights of conscience, I must have abandoned my own position, a position difficult enough to maintain—full of sorrow, involving an isolation from all parties; but, as I think, necessary for the good of all parties.

‘To make Colenso understand why I do this—that I am not a traitor to freedom and friendship also—is impossible at present. If I met him at your house I suspect we should only embarrass each other and embarrass you. We should either preserve a forced silence on all questions which were most interesting to us, or impose upon each other by words of doubtful signification. I hope hereafter we may understand each other better; but I should be sorry to lose the pleasure of free intercourse with you by making this effort. Still I leave this question wholly to you. I have met the Bishop several times, and there is, I hope, not the least unkindness between us.’

In the course of 1864 the Bishop of Capetown proceeded to take ecclesiastical action against Bishop Colenso. My father’s belief in the appeal to justice and to fixed laws expounded by lawyers as an appeal to the judgment of God against the tyranny of ecclesiastical public opinion, made him feel very strongly against these proceedings. His belief that Protestantism is for each nation the claim that God is the King of its king, that God presides over the law-courts of its king, his belief that every effort to arrive at right and justice is an effort to arrive at and submit to the will of the invisible King, made him more and more hostile to those measures which it became each year more difficult to distinguish from intrigues and plotting; of which the Bishop of Oxford was the centre; of which the effect was to set up the supremacy of what happened to be the current theological opinion of the day. On October 4th he wrote to the Times a letter on "the Bishop of Capetown and Spiritual Jurisdiction," in which he maintained that the claim of the Bishop of Capetown to set up a "Spiritual Jurisdiction" contra-distinguished to the rule of right and law, was the one against which the very existence of our national Church was a protest, which touched the most sacred point of our Protestant national position.

My father had been elected by the "Juridical Society," consisting entirely of distinguished lawyers, as their single non-legal member in this country. In November of 1864 he read a paper in which he maintained that no one ought to be excluded from giving evidence on the ground of religious unbelief.

To a Clergyman in South Africa.

'2 Brunswick Place, London, March 21, 1865.

'Your interesting letter reached me yesterday. That very day the decision was given by the Judicial Committee which concerns so greatly your position, and the points that are troubling you.* I had endeavoured to reflect on them, and I had read your able letters on the position of the Church of England before the judgment made its appearance. I had read also the important charge of the Bishop of Capetown in January last, wherein he seems quite prepared to face all the consequences which the judgment involves.

'With respect to your first question, how you ought to treat the Bishop of Natal if he presented himself to you as a communicant in your church, I can have no doubt whatever.

* The Privy Council decided against the Bishop of Capetown on the ground that his Court had no jurisdiction.

With your feelings you could not treat him as an ex-communicate person. No presbyter, I should suppose no bishop, in England would dare to do so ; I should think the act in a colony in which he has dwelt and ministered—though not a part of his diocese—more, not less inexcusable. Of course I do not speak of those who accept the decree of the Synod as of divine authority ; but of you, who see in it no authority divine or human. The awful responsibility of cutting off any fellow-creature, to say nothing of a bishop, from the fellowship of the Church is one, surely, which you could not incur unless you had the fullest conviction that he had cut himself off from it, and that those who said that he had were not assuming an unrighteous jurisdiction.

‘As to the other question of allowing him to preach, I should judge differently. Here I would apply to you the same principle which I should apply to myself. If he had been my diocesan, and I did not think he had been rightfully deposed, I should consider myself bound to let him enter my pulpit. I should not invite him, but should hold myself pledged by my canonical obedience to let him exercise what functions he thought fit in any church under my control. Being, as I think you are, in the diocese of Graham’s Town, you should, it seems to me, obey the Bishop of Graham’s Town, whatever you may think of Colenso, even if you agree more nearly with him than with your own ordinary. He [the Bishop of Graham’s Town] may be exercising an unwise authority in inhibiting you from receiving one man or another to officiate in your church ; but it is within his proper function to inhibit you—and as I should comply with the order in London, so, it strikes me, should you in Port Elizabeth. Indeed, I should not wait for a formal inhibition. In that case I should yield to a known wish.

‘These would be my opinions without the least respect to the recent decision. If that has any effect on your personal conduct, it leaves you freer to act in both cases on the maxims I have indicated. You are not asked by English law to pay the least respect to the decrees of the Synod ;

they are declared to be null and void. But neither are you asked to recognise the Bishop of Natal in that character; you are at liberty to consider him as having no diocese at all. I should hope he would submit to one part of the decision whilst he claims the benefit of the other, and not go back to a country where he has not a legal status, and where his presence can only breed strife. He is safe till he raises the question in the colony; if it is raised, your experience of the feelings of the laity, and the positive expression of the feelings of the clergy, convince me that he would come off worst.

‘I feel with you that the crisis is a very great one; that it must affect every English colony as well as South Africa; that it must affect us at home quite as seriously. Your position is indeed a very delicate and painful one; you will wait for higher guidance than mine to fulfil it. I am sure you will have the higher guidance, that it will raise you above the public opinion of clergymen and laymen, and above the terror of ecclesiastical censures. The more anxiously you strive to comply with ecclesiastical order when you can do so without departing from principle, the less will those terrors harm you; you may help to teach your bishops the difference between the office of a father in God and of an inquisitor or persecutor.

‘I remember the delight with which I contemplated the establishment of such a fatherly authority in our colonies. It seemed to me just what was wanted to check the wild craving for gain; to show that the Gospel unites instead of dividing, to balance the rigidity of mere law. At present all looks as confused as possible. The Church is determined to set itself up as a rival to the legal power, it foregoes all peaceful dominion over the settlers, and leaves them to regard the pursuit of money as the only real one; it aspires to be one of the sects. But good will come out of all this tumult. God’s purposes will accomplish themselves if men’s are ever so perverse.

‘Will you let me say a word to you about the sentiments of the laity who puzzle you and even, very naturally, provoke you by their indifference about what seem to you the interests of freedom, while they will be madly factious for what offends their supposed rights? I had felt a stronger interest in Colenso's diocese and mission than any other. He and his wife were old friends of mine. He had behaved very generously to me. When he avowed his sympathy with my refusal to speak of threescore years and ten as the limit of God's education of men, I was ready to follow him in any conflicts into which he might enter. When he set himself at war with the Jewish economy and the life of the Old Testament, I was utterly struck down. I had always believed that the great barrier against ecclesiastical oppression and tyranny, the great hold upon the conscience of the English nation, the great hope of every nation, lay in asserting the maxim of the Old Testament that God is Himself the Deliverer, that His name is the ground of national liberty. To have a quantity of criticism about the dung in the Jewish camp, and the division of a hare's foot, thrown in my face, when I was satisfied that the Jewish history had been the mightiest witness to the people for a living God against the dead dogmas of priests, was more shocking to me than I can describe. Yet the consequence was inevitable. Scientific men claimed Colenso on this very ground as the apostle of free thought; the clergy in general wrapped themselves more closely in their dreary and hopeless literalism; those who called themselves liberal were offended that any one who disliked that literalism should desert him whom they considered the one episcopal antagonist of it. Hard it has been to maintain what has appeared to me the right position in this struggle. I must have seemed very cold and cruel to Colenso; often I seemed so to myself. But the duty of vindicating the Old Testament as the great witness for liberty appeared to me a paramount one. And now I am more than ever convinced that it was. For I see the Bishop of Capetown waging a fiercer war against the principle of the Old Testament than Bishop Colenso has done. A thing called a Church, consisting of a metropolitan and a synod, a poor imitation of a popedom, is to set aside the glorious traditions of the English nation which were grounded upon the Old Testament, which were the deliverance from priestly tribunals and a king-bishop.

Well! if you can speak of these traditions to the laity, if you can show that you have no sympathy with any depreciation of the Old Testament, that you claim it as the Divine authority for the true life of our nation at home—of yours if it is to be an independent nation in South Africa—that you look upon the Church as that universal body consisting of kindreds and nations and tongues, which is to be far more extensive than the nation, but which can never cease to recognise and uphold that, I think there will be a response not only from those who adhere to the Church of England, but from many who have grown up in Puritan communities. They will always suspect you if they think you are taking the Bible from them. They will love you in time, if not at first, if you restore the Bible to them; its professed worshippers as well as the ecclesiastics have been stealing it from them. Excuse this long letter, which your kind appeal to me has provoked.'

To the Dean of Westminster.

'2 Brunswick Place, York Terrace, N.W.,

'April 27, 1865.

'MY DEAR STANLEY,

I thank you very gratefully for your pamphlet on Subscription. It seems to me sound and convincing.

You know that my earliest theological essay was written in support of the doctrine opposed to yours. I have been reflecting earnestly on the principles of that pamphlet and I have not seen cause to abandon them. The practical conclusion in it I do abandon unreservedly. I saw years ago that it was inapplicable to the Universities. I see now that being inapplicable to them, it is equally so to those who take orders. I am quite prepared to sign any petition for the entire abolition of subscription either for laymen or clergymen.

'At the same time I do not expect any advantage but some peril to those who hold convictions which are very dear to me from this change. I believe we shall be more at the mercy of the bishops and of the public opinion of the day when the Articles can no longer be invoked as an authority to control them. The judgments of lawyers, too, upon the import of words such as those in the Athanasian Creed on which Dr. Lushington pronounced, will then have no restraint from the significant words or omissions of the Articles. I think you have yourself shown that they have been bits in the mouths of religious parties from which they may be thankful to be free. But all these considerations have no weight with me against the evidence, which is overwhelming, that subscription is not taken in the only sense in which I have ever supposed it to be honest and reasonable; that it is a burthen upon the consciences of members, that it is making our formularies hateful to those who might most profit by them.

'With respect to the Prayer-Book, I think Lord Ebury's present Bill as good as it can be; one of the best and simplest pieces of legislation to be found in our day. To accept the Prayer-Book is far more honourable to it than to use language which seems to indicate—if it does not, as we have all supposed, mean the same thing with accepting—that the notions of a young man of twenty-three are the measures of its teaching. If the bishops insist upon retaining the assent and consent, they will be putting a force upon the words which they have never yet had, and will be making them intolerable. Disraeli's speech a year ago,* which the

* This was the "Is man an ape or an angel?" speech. It had been delivered at a meeting of the Diocesan Society of Oxford, in the very midst of the excitement against the judgment of the Privy Council which led to the Oxford "Declaration of Faith." At the moment it seemed to be a good piece of party tactics, to lead two formed and organised parties to crush out an insignificant minority; just as a few years later it seemed to be a good piece of party tactics to "put down ritualism." The sail which in this

Bishop of Oxford apparently heard with delight, has sealed the fate of subscription. If the clergy are bound by their oaths not to seek for fresh light, they renounce, as I told my congregation yesterday, the vows of their baptism, they bid the Holy One of Israel cease from before them, they make themselves the servants of the prince of darkness.

'I shall write a letter to the Spectator in reference to your pamphlet, simply to clear my conscience. I am rather afraid that my support may weaken its effect. You must forgive me if it does.'

To Rev. C. Kingsley.

'2 Brunswick Place, York Terrace, N.W.,

'May 18, 1865.

'If I cannot see you I wish very much to see your sermon. I quite agree with you that theology is what our age is crying for, even when it thinks that it is crying to be rid of theology. To be free from every theodicy—from every attempt to construct a divinity out of the notions of divines or philosophers, or an Exeter Hall conception of what a Mighty Being must do or ought to do with a rebellious universe—is a great necessity for us.

'But those who talk of leaving men to their religious instincts or their perceptions of morality, are preparing a fresh succession of such burthens for us and our children. It is the instance Mr. Disraeli spread to catch the favouring wind, was a firm assertion that the articles are intended to tie the clergy down so that the laity may have a security that the clergy are not going beyond the letter to which they are bound. As this was to assume a position the exact opposite of that for which my father had contended all his life, it was part of the programme that Mr. Disraeli should choose the moment when my father was standing in what looked like a forlorn hope, to attack him. The attack had just this much effect on my father, that it made him much more eager than he would otherwise have been, when a little later Mr. Disraeli introduced his Bribery Bill, to express enthusiasm for it. The Bill carried out the reform my father cared most for: the transfer, from the House of Commons to the judges, of the trial of bribery petitions. My father declared that Disraeli deserved a statue for that act. He was very angry with Mr. Gladstone for opposing it.

incubus of morbid religious instincts, of partial apprehensions about justice and mercy and their inevitable hostility, under which we have been so long groaning. What but a revelation of God in the Living Word (i.e. theology) ever has emancipated in any degree, or ever can emancipate, the nations thoroughly from that oppression?

‘The Name into which we are baptized, the Name which was to bind together all nations, comes out to me more and more as that which must at last break these fetters. I can find none of my liberal friends to whom that language does not sound utterly wild and incomprehensible, while the orthodox would give me for the eternal Name the dry dogma of the Trinity—an opinion which I may brag of as mine, given me by I know not what councils of noisy doctors and to be retained in spite of the reason, which it is said to contradict—lest I should be cast into hell for rejecting it. I am sure this Name is the infinite all-embracing charity which I may proclaim to publicans and harlots as that in which they are living and moving and having their being, in which they may believe, and by which they may be raised to the freedom and righteousness and fellowship for which they were created.

‘Will not our lips be some day opened to say that this is even so, and that the kingdom of heaven is not a possession for those who would shut it up, but for those who would open it, as the Apostles did, to all kindreds and tongues and tribes? All perplexities and contradictions of human opinion and practice, seem to me preparing the way for this discovery; otherwise they would drive me to despair.’

Also to Rev. C. Kingsley (in answer to the letter on p. 180, Vol. II., of the smaller edition of Mr. Kingsley’s ‘Life’).

‘May 20, 1865.

‘I thank you for wishing to have an explanation, and version into English, of my queer phraseology about baptism. It must have sounded to you and to many as pedantical and grotesque, especially as after once adopting it I have pertinaciously adhered to it, and have seemed incapable of giving any tolerable equivalent for it in nineteenth-century speech. I will try to account for both of these eccentricities.

‘That sacraments must be the organon of a revelation, if it fulfil its pretensions, that they have been actually so to Christendom, is the lesson which I owe to our Tractarian school, and to the Romanist teachers from whom they have received their lore; the one which history has confirmed in my mind; the one which has been my great deliverance from the dogmatism of Dr. Pusey and of the popes. For if sacraments express the purpose, and the relation of God to man, dogmas cannot express it. To dogmatise about sacraments is to destroy their nature. To dogmatise about God is to assume that man does not receive the knowledge of God from Him, but imputes the forms of his own intellect to Him. Sacraments are, as I think, the necessary form of a revelation, precisely because they discover the Divine nature in its union with the human, and do not make the human the standard and measure of the Divine. Suppose then I find this baptism into the Divine Name as the form which has been recognised by Greeks, Romanists, Protestants of all classes and opinions, for these twelve or thirteen hundred years (to go back no further and to involve oneself in no antiquarian discussions), that seems to me as complete a declaration to all these Greek, Romanist, Protestant nations, as I can imagine, of Him in whom they are living, moving, having their being, a far graver protest than it is possible to invent against their divisions and hatreds, against the pretensions by which their priests have exalted themselves into the throne of Omnipotence, against the oppressions which have assumed the Devil to be the real Lord of the Universe. And I am unwilling, if you please unable, to change the form which has this kind of sanction to its worth and universality for any other, because I can find no other which does not secretly let in human dogmatism, which does not contract to the limits of a school formula, apprehensible only by schoolmen, that which was meant for the universe. The Name must, according to the logician, be an attribute; I attribute it to God. If He has a name and can reveal it, the notion of it as an attribute given by men is a contradiction. Upon this the whole question turns; the question debated through all the middle ages, debated with the alternative of Godliness or Atheism now; “Is logic the mistress of theology or only one of its handmaids?”

“To me it seems that baptism into the Name contains that Gospel to all nations which St. Paul preached to the Athenians, and that if we abandon it for any other we shall not declare Christ to man, but only proselytise a few of them to our Christianity, so making them twofold more the children of hell than ourselves, which, as I remember you once observed, must be a very difficult process indeed.

“So much for my justification, and I would hope for a little more than that. As to your project of reading metaphysics to get rid of the effects of fiction, it may be good for a time. But history is surely the more direct cure and the more strictly within your calling. I hope you will never desert that for metaphysics. To me it has been the blessed refuge from them.

“People send me books about final causes, primary beliefs, and so on. I gaze at their covers, wish I could read them, and sometimes actually contrive to do it; but scarcely unless I can find some historical or biographical interest in them and can persuade myself that a man has been fighting his way to some final cause, or that a nation of men is laying hold of some primary belief. I wrote to Mill that I could not think of him as the most accomplished of metaphysicians, that I had recollections of him as a human being which effaced the other impression; I do not think he was displeased at that sort of recognition.”

The assassination of President Lincoln, in April, 1865, caused a thrill of horror throughout England. Happening, as it did, just when a second Reform Bill had become a certainty, there was a disposition among some of the radical section of my father's friends to treat Lincoln as a kind of martyr to democracy, and to appeal to the working-men's sympathies on this score. My father vehemently opposed this.

To Mr. Ludlow.

‘ May, 1865.

‘ As to democracy, I regard Lincoln's inauguration speech as the grandest return from the democracy of the Declaration of Independence to the theocracy of the Pilgrim Fathers that I have seen anywhere. I always hoped that might be the effect of the war on the best Americans. I never dreamed of seeing it expressed officially in such language as that. And it was not merely the old Calvinistic theocracy—the divinity minus humanity. In so far as it recognised the Divine vengeance for the wrongs of the coloured race, it implied a Christ as Head of the human race. I should count it a treason to Lincoln's memory to relapse into the other kind of speech, as we must do if we call the people to sympathise with him as a democrat. The horror of democracy which you impute to me is a horror in the interest of the people.

‘ I believe the Sovereign has been great so far as he or she has confessed a ministry—ignominious so far as he or she has merely clutched at a dominion; that the nobles have been great so far as they have confessed a ministry—ignominious so far as they have been aristocrats or oligarchs. I apply the same maxim to the larger class. If they will accept the franchise as a ministry, as an obligation—if any one of them, like Lincoln, accepts any function, be it as high as it may, as a calling—I shall rejoice. If they grasp at any power merely as a power, I believe the voice of Demos will be the devil's voice and not God's. I apply no different rule to one set of men from that which I apply to another. I look on the tyranny of the one, the few, or the majority, with like abhorrence. And I am confident, as the Emperor of the French is, that the tyranny of the majority is the surest step to the tyranny of the one.’

To Rev. C. Kingsley.

‘May 6, 1865.

‘Your kind words about my book against Mansel caused me both pleasure and surprise. I thought it was dead and buried long ago, and that having just done the good work of alienating me from philosophers and divines, the liberals and the orthodox, it would never be heard of again. It was written in great heat and vehemence of spirit, I suppose with less calmness than befitted such a subject. But I did feel then and feel now that it is the most important controversy of our time; and that all others must depend upon it.

‘Mill, I see, has used some very noble language in his new work on Sir W. Hamilton,* in protesting against a God to whom we attribute qualities which have a certain signification in man, and then say that they have an altogether different signification in Him.’

Also to Rev. C. Kingsley.

‘2 Brunswick Place, York Terrace, N.W.,

‘May 8, 1865.

‘I think you will agree with me that the whole seventh chapter of the book which I send you by post to-day, pp. 88–105, is as masterly as anything which has been written in our day, and that the passage in pp. 102–103 is a grand and affecting theological statement, as it proceeds from a man who was bred an Atheist and perhaps takes himself to be one. For me it has a force and impressiveness which it might not have for one who did not know Mill in early days; but I am sure you will appreciate it. Please return the book, as you will see I have not yet read it. I will send you Mansel if you like it (i.e. the earlier edition). I have not the fourth, to which Mill refers, and which I suppose contains some contemptuous refutation of me. Mill would, I dare say, agree with him generally in his opinion of that; but this cannot signify when Mill has said with such emphasis in a few words what I was trying to say in a long series of letters.

* “Examination of Sir W. Hamilton’s Philosophy, and of the principal philosophical questions discussed in his writings,” 8vo. 1865.

To a Son on the Continent.

‘May 17, 1865.

‘MY DEAREST E.,

‘. . . I hold to my opinion about the nobles as the defenders of English law, and liberty, as connected with law, in many periods of history. Nor do I think America could have known what liberty is apart from equality if she had not inherited our traditions and retained a very great leaven of our reverence for the family and for ancestors mixed with their democracy. The mistake of assuming the Declaration of Independence as the commencement of their history has been fully exposed by De Tocqueville, and is recognised by the wisest among themselves. Though I am afraid my good friend Ludlow has never perceived it. . . .

‘Mill’s friends speak hopefully of his prospects, and Gladstone’s of his; especially since the list of their two committees has appeared. But I cannot feel sanguine in either case. I had a very kind note from Mill in answer to a letter of thanks I wrote him for his book on Sir W. Hamilton. I have in some stupid way mislaid the note, which I value exceedingly. . . .’

After Mr. Gladstone’s defeat at Oxford he writes again :

‘July 21, 1865.

‘I hope Oxford will have cured all her Liberal members of setting up the will of the majority against intelligence and moral force. Any will-of-the-wisp is better than that, let John Bright say what he likes. . . .’

To Mr. John Hodgkin, after reading his Son’s pamphlet on Inspiration.

‘2 Brunswick Place, York Terrace, July 31, 1865.

‘When 1100 clergymen declared eighteen months ago that the Bible not only contains, but is, the Word of God, the position struck me not as an exaggeration, but as a perilous denial of the truth. The Word of God, I believe, as St. John taught and as George Fox taught, to be very much above the Scriptures, however he may speak by and in the Scriptures. While the truth is not distinctly put forth—whilst it is smothered in mere scholastical language like that which Dr. Pusey used when he said that the Word of God in one sense means the second person of the Trinity, in another sense the written book—I cannot see how this controversy is to end, for I suspect that our impressions about each of these senses will be equally unreal, equally confused.

‘Now what I should have craved of a member of the Society of Friends, writing on the inspiration of Scripture, would have been especially an exposure of our unbelief on this subject, and a vindication of the doctrine which may at times have been used negatively to diminish the reverence for the Scriptures, but which may also be the great restorer of that reverence, which may do more than any other to connect it with the demands of the human conscience and reason. Again and again I said to myself, as I read Mr. Hodgkin’s essay, “What strength it would give to that and that assertion and argument, and how the missing link in it would be supplied, if the writer would speak as the Bible itself speaks of the Divine Word, if he would bear witness to his readers that he has a Teacher with him continually, whether he reads the letters of the book or cannot spell out one of them.” It seems, I know, to many, as if this were an advanced lore to which we must arrive through the previous reception of the volume, and of all the uninspired and unauthoritative evidences which are supposed to establish its inspiration and authority. But that is to me a practical denial of the very truth which we wish to prove, a glorification of the speech above Him whom we believe to be the speaker. And if it is true, as the Bible says, that by the Word of the Lord were the heavens framed, and the earth by the breath of His mouth, may not this be the true way to the removal of scientific perplexities? Nay, is it not possible that the scientific men may have been led by a higher teaching than they knew, to break through certain apparent constructions of the letter that they may lead us to a deeper theology, that they may bring us to confess the presence of Him in whom is life, and whose life is the Light of Men? God's ways are not as our ways. What we dread most as signs of unbelief may be His method of scattering unbelief. Theologians and scientific men may both wake up with awe, and say, "He was in the place, and we knew it not."

'I have taken the liberty of making these remarks, feeling that so I should best be complying with your kind request for criticism, and that I should be relieving my own mind of a burden which often lies heavily upon it. The Bible becomes dearer and more sacred to me the more I read it; I have no sympathy with its arraigners, even too little with its critics. Yet I feel compelled often to stand with both against those who turn it into a god, and so deny the living God of whom it bears witness. That idolatry is so fearful, and the numbers who are rushing into it so great and respectable, that I feel we ought to bear any reproaches and any suspicions, rather than be the instruments of promoting it.

'But as a true, devout reverence for the Scriptures is the best discouragement of it, I heartily thank your son for what he has done to cultivate that feeling.'

To Mr. Ludlow.

A meeting of the Working Men's College had been called for August 2nd, to congratulate Mr. Hughes on his election as Member for Lambeth.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

'August 1, 1865.

'I will try to say something of what you wish me to say to-morrow night. I cannot say anything too good of Hughes. But in looking over the events of seventeen years a man just sixty finds reasons for mourning which would not accord with such a festivity. The sense of an obligation to proclaim God as the deliverer not the enslaver of the nations was working in me, and I think more or less in all of us, when we first met. Every year I have felt it more strongly, and felt more my own weakness to fulfil it. The thought, that the greatest effort of those, who speak most of freedom, is to throw off the witness for God, as the emancipator, which was borne in the times of old, and that those, who cling most to the Bible, regard Him as a tyrant, sometimes overwhelms me. But the personal humiliation—the discovery how little I have really done or even cared for that cause which I have been sent into the world to live and die for—this has been useful and has led me sometimes to pray with earnestness that God would vindicate His own Name and Will, since our efforts to vindicate them are so vain and paltry.’

To a Son travelling on the Continent.

‘MY DEAREST E.,

‘Fryston Hall, August 15, 1865.

‘. . . I am much delighted by the interest you take in the pictures at Dresden. I am sure the right way to admire any great work of art is to know it thoroughly, to let it speak to you, and not to be in a hurry to form an opinion about it. What you say about the religion of the old Catholic pictures and the difficulty of receiving it in our days has much truth in it. I used to mourn at the thought and to be pained by it. Now it gives me hope. I look upon Protestantism as unfriendly to Art, favourable to Science. But out of it, I believe, will arise a faith deeper and broader, warmer than Romanism, more devoted to Truth than Anti-Romanism, under which Science and Art will flourish as sisters. Over all the visions of the past in which the old artists indulged, there is a dark shadow; it hangs often more heavily still over our study of the present. There will come a time when the future will be presented to us in colours grand and awful, but full of brightness, when the Revelation of the Son of Man and His judgment, instead [of] being [a] gloomy spectacle, such as they appeared to Michael Angelo and Tintoretto, will be contemplated as the true accomplishment of the mystery of the Birth and the Cross and Resurrection, which were all that could give them any sense of reconciliation. The new heaven and new earth, wherein dwells Righteousness, will be regarded as the satisfaction of the poet's and the patriot's dreams, not as blessings which are to reward the few, and from which the multitude are to be shut out.

'I have had an interesting letter from a young man—a Congregationalist in Philadelphia—who is very busy in a commission for the education of whites and blacks. "We have a nation," he says, "some nine millions to educate," and he asks whether I, having written a book about learning and working, cannot give them some hints! I wrote to him telling him how little he could learn from me, and how much I desired to learn from those who had passed through so great a crisis, and how much I was convinced that the fruits of their struggle would appear in the whole after-history of their continent and of mankind. Not liking, however, to put him off with such words, I told him a few things which I fancied I had derived from our experience, especially about the grounds on which religious parties might possibly work together. His deference to the judgment of one of the old country, with influence and means so slight as mine, struck me as very touching and humiliating.'

To Rev. C. Kingsley (in answer to letter on p. 181, Vol. II., smaller edition, of Mr. Kingsley's 'Life,' beginning "You say," which, though it is not there marked as an independent letter, is quite unconnected with the former part, to which the answer is given on p. 494 of this vol.)

'October 26, 1865.

'The question which I considered in my pamphlet ['Subscription no Bondage'] was this—"On what ground do we require subscription at the University?" The subscription at Ordination I spoke of, but only by the way. There were two answers to the first question popular at the time when I wrote. The first was, "We do it as a pledge of the adherence of the students to the Church of England; it is a test of Communion." To this I answered, "The Articles are no test of Communion in the Church of England. We admit persons to our Communion, we claim persons as members of our body, who may never have read the Articles, may not even have heard of them." The second answer was, "It is to prevent the students from freely exercising their thoughts." "What?" I said. "You do this just as you are bringing them into a place of education, where you must stimulate them to exercise their thoughts in all directions: when you have to struggle continually with their reluctance to think. No, it cannot be for this end Articles were imposed just at the Reformation time when all men's faculties were awake, when they were most convinced of the danger of putting them to sleep. But what were they imposed for, if not for these ends? Why," I asked, "did Bacon write the 'Novum Organum?' He prohibits various natural and favourite processes of the intellect, and he knocks down various idols. He does this to promote investigation, not to arrest it. Why is it absurd to say that the Articles were meant to serve this purpose, to hinder theological notions and ways of thinking, from checking manly study—as they had done—theological study, human study, natural study? Why is it absurd to say that they have served this purpose, that they have given a direction or method to thoughts and inquiries, that they have prevented various superstitions from making the thoughts and inquiries abortive? Here then is the answer to your question about such Articles as the one on the Trinity binding the conscience." I, of course, believe—all Christendom professes to believe—that faith in the Trinity is faith in the comprehensive all-embracing name of God, the infinite charity—that it is the faith of which all narrower faiths were the anticipation and prophecy. I announce in formal words to young baptized men that we do start from the recognition of this fulness of the Godhead—that it underlies all our thoughts and belief. Do I expect these young men, because I tell them this, to acquiesce in a certain general notion or formula about the Trinity? God forbid! I know that if they think, they must pass, some more, some less, consciously through phases of Arianism, Sabellianism, Tritheism, through Pantheism in many shapes. I know that they will be often on the borders of Atheism. I deliberately stir up the thoughts which will be drawn in these directions; I give them the pledge and hope of a home and resting-place after their toil; I say it is nigh, not afar off. You are living, moving, having your being in this God; but you may traverse many lonely deserts, and ford many rivers, and scale many mountains before you discover how near He is. Spinozism, Hegelism, Comtism—all may offer themselves to you on your pilgrimage; you may turn in for a while and rest in any of them; and God, not we, must, if our faith is true, teach you that there is any larger and freer dwelling-place than that which they afford.

‘What then is subscription? I answer, it expresses the consent of the students to be taught according to certain conditions of thought. These are not with us as in many Universities suppressed conditions, existing in the mind of the teacher; they are acknowledged; the student is served with a notice of them; the teacher and he enter upon their work with a mutual understanding of the terms on which it is to be conducted.

‘That being my doctrine, the discovery made by the controversies about the 90th Tract that the teacher, even more than the student, did not accept these as his conditions of thought, that he wished to evade them (and I could not at all limit that desire for evasion to the person who confessed it or to his school), obliged me to rejoice when the University subscriptions at matriculations and for the A.B. degrees were abolished, and to wish that the measure so begun should be completed. I cannot but feel that subscription might make University teaching and learning more honest, that it does make both less honest. I see the consequences of an unconditioned teaching in Oxford now; but I regard those consequences as inevitable. Everything there is unsettled; but there can be no return to the old settlement; a new one must be sought for, however long we may be in finding it.

‘But clerical subscription you will say rightly stands on a different ground. About that I feel, and have always felt, the great force of your observations. I have heard Stanley say himself that he knows he is parting with a protection against a number of popular charges, when he gives it up. But the loss seems to him compensated by greater gains. The preservation of subscription, he believes, is almost incompatible with a preservation of respect for the Articles.* Take it away and they may resume their hold on the minds of the clergy. They may feel the want of the guide under which, while it was imposed upon them, they fretted. They may read simply and construe naturally words which they now seek to explain away.

‘I have been slowly convinced that he is right. I think the dependence upon lawyers and their freedom from theological influences in the interpretation of words, is quite precarious. I scarcely know one—except Lord Westbury, who combines sufficiently the qualities of a perfectly clear legal intellect with utter indifference to all moral and spiritual considerations—to ensure this kind of fidelity. The best lawyers, e.g., Cairns or Roundell Palmer, would certainly be exposed to a multitude of extraneous influences which would induce them, quite unconsciously, to interpret the language of our formularies in conformity with the notions of the age. Which of them, for instance, would not treat as merely idle what you have said—so forcibly and it seems to me demonstrably—about the use of the word eternal in the Athanasian Creed? But how if one could count upon the legal judgments—think of all the weakening of our moral influence which comes from the notion which Pusey and the Bishop of

* It will be seen, from what happened afterwards, that my father here attributes to Dean Stanley a feeling about the Articles which Dean Stanley certainly did not share with him as strongly as he supposed. This argument for doing away with subscription told much on my father, not, at all events a few years later, on the Dean. Vide p. 605 of this vol.

Oxford and Disraeli will din into the ears of the multitude, that we only exist by the favour of the lawyers! We may know that we mean truth, and may be convinced that we are standing for the truth against their distortions and evasions of it. But the appeal to our subscription, though I would always make it feeling it to be a thoroughly honest one, is, as I have found, a very feeble barrier against these accusations. I believe the appeal to the Articles if subscription were done with, would be after a while much stronger. I hope you will now understand, whether you agree with me on this point or not, what I mean by Articles "not binding the conscience." Of course the expression is equivocal. The conscience may be bound by that which sets it free. But this binding is the very reverse of that which is popularly understood by the word; and it is the popular sense against which I protest.'

CHAPTER XVI.

"I am sure that this, which they reject, is still the simple faith of hundreds of poor men and women, in all countries of the world, Romish as well as Protestant. I am sure that they have a belief—a very deep-rooted, practical belief—that the Bible sets forth God as actually speaking to men, as actually ruling in the midst of them. I am sure that they have no doubt that what was true in the old time is true now, and that neither Scripture, nor conscience, nor church, nor holy see, deeply and profoundly as they may reverence one or all, would seem to them worth anything,—the least comfort in their own sorrows, the least relief from the sense of the misery and curse of the world; if they did not think that the living God was teaching them, and disciplining them, and holding converse with them, and that the whole course of society amidst all its strange contradictions, is as much testifying of His presence as it did when the manna fell from heaven."—F. D. M., Epistle to the Hebrews.

PUBLICATION OF 'ROBERTSON'S LIFE AND LETTERS'—LETTER ON EVIDENCES—PEARSON ON THE CREED—CORNEWALL LEWIS AS CRITIC—BUTLER'S 'ANALOGY'—'ECCE HOMO'—MR. KING'S PROPOSAL TO EXPOSE THE 'RECORD' WRITERS—WHY F. D. M. STOPPED IT—DR. PUSEY'S 'EIRENICON'—DR. NEWMAN'S LETTER IN REPLY—DEAN STANLEY ON BOTH—THE 'HEALING OF THE WOUNDS OF THE DAUGHTER OF MY PEOPLE'—WISHES BISHOP EWING TO EDIT A SERIES OF 'CONFESSIONS'—VISIT TO OXFORD AND THOUGHTS THERE—ON ETERNAL LIFE AND ON THE POSSIBILITY OF SORROW IN HEAVEN—THE COMMANDMENTS.

To Mr. King, the publisher, (thanking him for a present of 'Robertson's Life and Letters.')

'2 Brunswick Place, York Terrace, N.W., November 13, 1865.

"You will believe that it was from no want of gratitude that I have delayed to thank you for your invaluable present. I would not write till I had read nearly through the Life and Letters.

‘I could have read them more rapidly, but I have read them all aloud to my sick wife, who has shared all my delight in them. I could envy Mr. Brooke the honour of doing so great a work, and of doing it so entirely to the honour of his subject, with such noble carelessness about his own. I had trembled very much when I heard the book announced, and scarcely had courage to open it. But it is all that could be desired; no word in the Letters too much; what has been suppressed, I am sure ought to have been. And there is amply enough to discover the man in all his reality and all his variety. The steps in the history succeed each other with such evident truth. And it is delightful to find Robertson often contradicting himself as every true man does, and his biographer resolved not to make him consistent with himself at the expense of his veracity, and to the destruction of the fullness and vivacity of his intellect and character. There has been no book like it for a long time. You must look at it with profound interest and tenderness.

‘There is no fear of its [not] being sufficiently reviewed and sufficiently praised. I am only afraid that some critic will get up such a phrase as “morbid” and work it, and that the rest of the sheep, as they are wont to do, will leap after him. There should be some attempt to counteract that impression—while justice is done to it—by bringing out the continual struggle against morbidness which is manifest in every page of his life.’

At the end of a very long letter to Mr. Vaughan on his book on Scientific Evidence, after discussing the effect which Niebuhr had had upon the study of history, he continues :

To Rev. D. J. Vaughan.

‘November 22, 1865.

‘You see how directly the Niebuhrian investigations bring me face to face with the characteristics of the Hebrew history, with those which some of our own more devout Rationalists would eliminate as not being connected with religion. God according to them has nothing to do with nations and politics. They are to be left to such men as Metternich and Louis Napoleon. Accursed doctrine; part of that Atheism of our religious world which nothing but a baptism of the Spirit and of fire can deliver us from.

‘This unbelief about nations, Colenso, I apprehend, shares with his opponents. It comes out equally in both. And it should be observed that Colenso has not the least studied under Niebuhr. He belongs, if he has investigated such questions at all, to the later and merely negative school of Sir G. C. Lewis, who scorned Niebuhr for supposing that any discoveries could be made about the history of a nation unless there were contemporary—or nearly contemporary—testimony respecting the events which had befallen it. A marvellous scepticism, upheld by an equally marvellous credulity. Sir G. C. Lewis could believe in no evidence coming to his own reason and conscience; he could, after living through the Crimean War and the Indian Mutiny, depend upon the contemporary testimony which told him one day that the defeats of the Russians were entirely due to the French, the next that the French had almost no share in them; one day that hundreds of men and women were mutilated by the Sepoys, the next that there were none!

‘This worship of mere testimony has been the disease of our theologians and historical students for more than two centuries. It is that which makes Pearson’s book on the Creed so destructive of belief in the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. We believe, because credible people—that is, people whom we think credible—tell us we ought to believe; that it is dangerous not to believe. I go great lengths with you in your bold saying that Butler’s ‘Analogy’ should be written over again in our time. Written over again in this sense: that it may be reconciled with his own doctrine on the conscience. If he was right—or made any approach to right—in the sermon on the Conscience, it could not be necessary that he should help out his argument on moral probability by an ignominious appeal to men's fears; by showing them how perilous it might be not to act even upon the hundredth chance of the evidence for the Gospel (!) being true. Written over again also in the sense that the name revelation must assume an altogether different significance from that which it bears in his phrase revealed religion; must be restored to the meaning which it has in the first chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, and everywhere else in St. Paul's writings; must therefore no longer stand in contrast to the supposed proofs derived from Nature. Revelation must be the discovery of God to a creature formed to know Him and be like Him, a revelation therefore to the reason and conscience of men, a revelation of the Will that is every moment acting on his will. When this principle is established, the Analogy, I think, will have a message to us which it has never yet had; while this principle is denied, I fear probable evidence will only be that which I may accept if the traditions of my country and certain terrors in my nerves make me wish to accept it. I own that I never have been, and never can be, content with probable evidence when it is opposed to demonstration. I ask for a demonstration of the Spirit with power to my spirit. I believe it as real a demonstration as any which comes to my intellect from the propositions in Euclid. In both cases truth unveils itself to an organ which has been formed to entertain it. . . .'

To Miss Williams Wynn.

'December 20, 1865.

' . . . Have you looked at the new book called 'Ecce Homo'? It is very interesting and remarkable, whatever be the main design of it, about which there may be different opinions. My own is that the author is thoroughly in earnest; that he has fairly considered the life of Jesus from Renan's point of view, to whom however he never alludes, and has arrived at the conclusion that entire veracity is the only solution of the riddle which it presents. That is my impression; I doubt not both orthodox people and unbelievers will attribute a very different purpose to him. At all events the style of writing and the course of thought are those of an accomplished scholar, a layman beyond all question, of much courage, without being ever irreverent or inclined to hurt the feelings of ordinary Christians. All his ways of contemplating the subject are so nearly the direct opposite of mine, that I am less afraid of bearing that testimony.'

A furious reception had been given by the Record to the 'Life and Letters' of Robertson of Brighton, when the book appeared at the end of 1865. Mr. King, the publisher, wrote to my father to say that he proposed to insert in every volume of Robertson's Life or Sermons that was published an exposure by name of the men concerned in these attacks. The man who had been chiefly engaged in the life-long attacks upon my father, one of Robertson's assailants, had been recently exposed in a court of justice as engaged, at the very time he was the oracle of the religious world, in a long system of wrongful dealing towards a lady, who had trusted him, chiefly because of his religious reputation. Another man, the editor of one of the secular journals which had made itself most conspicuous in inserting the Record's articles and in raising the hue and cry after it, was all the time living with another's wife under circumstances of exceptional baseness.

Mr. King proposed to expose these facts and also to give the names of several other men whom he believed could not bear the light of day, and to ask: "Are these the men to be trusted as your teachers in religious life?"

My father's advice given in the following letter stopped this action:

'MY DEAR KING,

'January 15, 1866.

'You will not doubt that I share all your indignation against the Record for its treatment of Robertson and of his biographer. It deserves all and more than all the epithets which you apply to it. But whether you will do any good by sending forth your complaints; whether they will not be used by the Record to prove that it has a sting which can make those whom it wounds personally or through dear friends smart bitterly; whether it will not hug itself in the delight of possessing this power; whether it will not call upon its readers to recognise the necessity of such an instrument for punishing the enemies of the faith—I dare not pronounce. I feel myself too much a party—I know too well what an affectation it would be in me to pretend that they have not inflicted the pain that they were designed to inflict on me personally, and on friends who are gone—to be sure that I can write reasonably or impartially on this subject. I hold with you that there must be a way in our practice of reconciling Christ's command to forgive enemies and bless them, with His indignation against Scribes, Pharisees and hypocrites. But I do not feel that I know enough of His mind to be able to speak of the Pharisaism and hypocrisy of those who have attacked me without setting aside His first law. I have found it safer for my own peace of mind, and that I may not yield to the very tempers which offend my conscience in the Record, to let them expend their malice and to know as little about it as I can. Once or twice I have been tempted to address them through a solicitor and to offer them the opportunity of proving before a jury of their countrymen that they did not deserve to be called slanderers and liars. But on more earnest reflection I have felt that it was far better to let them prove me to be the knave and traitor to God which they say that I am; I have regretted any step which I have taken for the sake of retaliation. I have introduced myself rather awkwardly into this question merely that I may show you why I am not a fair adviser on it. Your injuries not being personal, are of a different and much higher kind; the resentment which would be unsafe in me may be right in you. But I would set off against this the possible weakening of Robertson's high and precious influence on the minds of those who read his sermons or his Life, by the association of either with such a controversy as any with the Record must be. It might be a lawful and right thing to box with a blackguard who insulted a lady, and to throw him into the gutter. But you would not like to soil her dress with your bloody hands.

‘The words of a departed and still living friend have a far greater sacredness. To soil them with the stains of even the must just quarrel is, it seems to me, almost profane. And this must, I think, be the effect of sending forth your paper as you propose with every copy of the sermons and the biography. I cannot bear to contemplate the kind of revulsion which a person who had been deeply impressed by one of those living discourses would experience in passing into this atmosphere. Whereas if he fell in with the Record after reading any of them, he would only be struck with the immense contrast between the heart of the preacher and that of the critic.

‘I leave these thoughts for your own consideration. They may have much or little and perhaps no worth. But they have been so strongly impressed on my mind that I could not withhold them. I will show the paper to Hughes as you wish. I do not know whether you desire his opinion upon the general expediency of publishing it, or on the particular question whether it might be liable to an action.

‘There is one point which has struck me much ; and which affords, I believe, an ample justification for Mr. Brooke’s treatment of Robertson’s supposed conversion from Evangelicalism against the Saturday Review, which the Record I see has claimed, amusingly enough, for an ally. The intense attachment to the person of Christ, which was the special characteristic of Robertson’s later life, was surely not a revolt against the teaching of the Evangelicals from whom he had received his first and deepest impressions ; it was a return to this most fundamental part of their teaching—to that which the older Evangelicals would have avowed to be such, after the husk of opinions, which had concealed it, had been cast away. His subsequent vehemence against Evangelicalism was precisely the cry of a passionate lover against that which had distorted the features and changed the expression of the mistress that was more than ever dear to him. It was not in the least the expression of a High Churchman or a Rationalist, who had abandoned her for some other object. There was therefore really no change to report, such as the Saturday Review imagines, such as might be explained as Dr. Newman explains his by this or that personal influence, or personal disgust. It was a much more radical conversion than this; for no conversion is so radical as that which brings a man back to the original type of his faith, which makes him separate what he has believed from what he has merely derived at second-hand from other men.

Those of us who have been educated in quite different schools from Mr. Robertson may know that the truth which we have to recover and hold fast is not the same with his, though if it does not meet and adopt his it must be worthless. When the Record calls me a Socinian it tells a lie—a particularly broad and immense lie—but it indicates a fact in my history which one of its editors happens to know, and which I never wish to forget. I was bred a Unitarian. To realise the meaning of the name of Father, the meaning of the Unity of God, is my calling and duty. I believe there cannot be a Father without an only Begotten Son of the same substance with Himself, that there cannot be any Unity but the Unity of the Eternal Father with the Eternal Son in the Eternal Spirit. I am therefore constantly striving after the idea, the root, of the faith in which I was educated, just because I regret much more than the Record does, the denials of those who call themselves Unitarians, many of whom however are striving, with zeal of which the Record knows nothing, after the true divine Unity. I merely mention this to illustrate what I have said about Robertson's faith, which I accept as absolutely necessary to my own being, and which I reverence and admire the more because the processes by which he attained it and his mode of contemplating it were so entirely unlike mine. In questions of doctrine we should never probably have understood each other. That he spoke so tolerantly and kindly of me, and was willing on one occasion to endure the disgrace of association with me, is a proof of his nobleness which I can never forget; nor [can I forget] the spiritual service he has rendered me since his death by the humanity and divinity of his sermons and by those struggles which Mr. Brooke has so admirably and faithfully exhibited. That the writers in the Record can see nothing in those struggles but conceit and madness will be—permit me to say so—a more utter exposure and condemnation of them in the hearts of good men and women and in their own consciences than any that can come from your words, honest and burning as they are.

‘You may make any use of this letter that you think fit.

‘P. S. I have a curate. If I had not, I should be ashamed to ask for Mr Brooke’s help, who deserves a much better incumbency than mine. Is he in want of temporary duty? Kingsley is looking out for some one who would take his parish for six weeks. I am sure he would delight to make Mr. Brooke’s acquaintance and to work with him afterwards. Might I put them in communication with each other?’

In the early part of 1866 the Bishop of Argyll and the Isles (Dr. Ewing) was proposing to bring out the series of “Present Day Papers,” which subsequently appeared. He wrote to my father to ask him to contribute. The next letter is in answer to a very beautiful letter of the Bishop’s (on p. 438 of the Memoir), where also is the answer to this.

To the Bishop of Argyll.

‘MY DEAR BISHOP,

‘March 1, 1866.

‘I felt the kindness of your last letter very much indeed. I deserved no such expression of your regard and confidence, much as I valued it.

‘I fear you can hardly hope for many contributions, such as you would like to insert, so early as May. I could write something soon on the subject to which I alluded, but it ought to be considered carefully.

‘I have been reading Pusey’s ‘Eirenicon’ and Newman’s “Letter,” and am more and more convinced that the want of both is that they look elsewhere for peace than to the centre of peace, for something else to hold the building together than the corner-stone. It must be healing the wounds of the daughter of my people, which have been opened so long, very slightly,* to propose certain explanations of the Thirty-Nine Articles which may make them tolerable to Romanists, or certain explanations of the decrees of the Council of Trent which may make them condemn (or not sanction) certain practices that are offensive to Anglicans. And evidently Pusey and Newman equally—or the first rather more than the second—look not to the Christ ascended into the heavens that He may fill all things as the bond of communion, but to some kind of descent into the elements. What that is must always be a subject of debate; it can never be a pledge of fellowship. Curiously enough, Newman defends Mariolatry because we want the idea of an ascended humanity as well as of a descended Godhead. A remarkable testimony to that which we do indeed want, the belief that He that descended is the same that ascended.’

Also to the Bishop of Argyll.

‘MY DEAR BISHOP, ‘9 South Parade, Bath, April 10, 1866.

‘It seems to me that the words, “That they all may be one as thou Father art in Me and I in Thee,” denote the only ground of Catholic unity; and that so long as any mortal bishop or prince assumes the place of Him in whom all things were created and by whom all things consist, so long there must be need of a protest to maintain this Catholic unity. I certainly find no explicit acknowledgment either of this Catholic or of this Protestant principle in Stanley’s comments on the ‘Eirenicon.’ I find an implicit denial of both in the 'Eirenicon' itself, in so far as it assumes that a union between divided churches may be effected by mere arrangements about dogmatic articles, whether the Thirty-Nine or those of the Council of Trent; or by an agreement of these churches to persecute and exclude certain persons or schools; in so far as it hints that the English Church may ally itself with a church which tries to fraternise in a Latin vicar of Christ, and not in Christ Himself, the ascended High Priest and Bishop and King of the universe. And I am much more inclined to hold with you that these and other indications foretell the approach of a great conflict and crisis in the Church, than with Stanley's notion that the improved temper of the age promises a quiet and happy solution of all controversies.

* “They have healed also the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly, saying, ‘Peace, peace; when there is no peace.’”—Jeremiah vi. 14 and viii. 11.

'Nevertheless I do accept the 'Eirenicon' in its barest and driest form as a sign that the question of our day is the question how the broken limbs of Christendom may be united; as a sign that all movements towards reformation now must be directly and consciously movements towards unity. And I do think that Stanley has very ably and beautifully indicated the inevitable departures from Pusey's approved and darling maxims, into which he has been forced by the effort to become in any form or under any limitations a minister of peace to hostile churches. Whatever therefore may be the immediate consequences from the High Church or the Broad Church manifesto, I am inclined to look upon both as divine messages which may help us in tracing the will of God concerning us.

'And it has occurred to me that perhaps you might derive from an observation of these signs of the times, a hint as to the nature of the work which you have contemplated. Instead of a volume of essays, might it not take the form of a volume of confessions?

'To such a volume, of course without any name, I think I might contribute; for I have had glimpses at times of the ways in which we Churchmen are striving against the Spirit of Truth and Charity; of the injuries which we have inflicted upon the world, while we charge our evils upon it, and suppose that it must be lost, while we are saved; of the restoration which God, who raiseth the dead, would effect for the world by quickening and uniting the Church; glimpses that have appalled me, and that seemed to demand humiliation and confessions, lest they should be forgotten and God's grace in sending them be set at nought.

'Others doubtless have had many more of such discoveries of God's purposes to us, and of our rebellions against them, and they may also find that method of expressing their shame and their hopes the safest and most reasonable.

'If you, as one of our fathers, would gather together a few of such confessions with any of your own and with any words of introduction or comment, it might be an Eirenicon such as no scheme of concord and adjustment is ever likely to be. I submit the thought to you with diffidence, but with some hope that you may entertain it and improve it.'

To his Wife.

'May 18, 1866.

'I have been at a wretched S. P. G. meeting about the Bishops of Natal and Capetown, and have not much heart to write many lines. Mr. ——— was at the meeting, which rather reminded him of an Irish row.'

'May 19, 1866.

'May all Whitsuntide blessings be with you! What more can one wish for those one loves best! The presence of the Holy Spirit I am sure we have continually. And we may be brought to remember his presence and to abide in Him. Every other gift would be included in that. I was much disturbed by the meeting on Friday of the S. P. G., and led to think how little we could do for spreading the Gospel whilst we were fighting against the Spirit, and letting another come and take possession of us. But I do hope and believe that He will prevail at last.'

Also to his wife (during a visit with one of his sons).

‘Oxford, May 21, 1866.

‘My enjoyment is mixed with some sad recollections, not only of friends whose places know them no more, of friends who are more widely separated from me than by death, and of that visit in 1844; * but of the little I have ever done for the place to which I owe so much, of the help I might have given to numbers of young men who have fallen probably into doubt or evil ways—of the life I might have led and have not led. Still over all there is a sense of a goodness and mercy that has followed me all my days, and that is about the boys, and that is with the young men whose faces are so full of promises of good and possibilities of evil. The love of God, the power of the Spirit, the very meaning of Whitsuntide and of Trinity, seem to come out as one walks in these old places, and looks at the young figures which haunt them. Would to God that I could tell them a little of the mystery which is about them! But He is telling it to them and to us.’

On July 11, 1866, my father read a paper before the Juridical Society, in which he maintained that the first step towards the destruction of bribery at elections, was to transfer the trial of election petitions from the House of Commons to the judges. It is remarkable that while all those who were present expressed their agreement in the truth of his contention no one then believed in the possibility of such a transfer, so soon afterwards to be carried through by Mr. Disraeli, despite Mr. Gladstone’s strong opposition.

To a Clergyman (on eternal life).

‘DEAR MR. —,

‘July 12, 1866.

‘The subject on which you have written to me has long appeared to me the most practically important with which the mind of a clergyman can be occupied. Everything in the work of our ministry as well as in our interpretation of the New Testament, depends upon the force which we give to those continually recurring words "eternal life." If they are a mere synonym for never-ending happiness—if that happiness is a prize to be bestowed hereafter for a certain proper behaviour here, or right faith here—every moment the question will arise, "To whom may we hold out the expectation of this happiness; in whom ought we to discourage the expectation?" and I believe the answer at which most earnest men will arrive—I can testify that it is the one to which I have arrived—must be, "At all events, I know one person who can make out no title to such happiness. I must check the expectation of it in myself. And this though I accept the testimony of Scripture and the verdict of experience that it is hope alone which purifies, that to be without hope is to be without God in the world."

* It had been one of the last journeys he ever took with my mother just before her death.

‘But supposing life means life, and supposing the gift of life, and the promise of eternal life, is the gift and the promise of a new, higher, nobler life than that which we have been leading, the divine life, the life of the eternal God; supposing Christ came into the world expressly to baptize men with this life, that they might live honestly and soberly in this present world, that they might be continually hoping for greater knowledge and energies proportioned to that knowledge, when the burthen of their death should be thrown off,—then I cannot see what danger there can be of speaking to harlots or to Pharisees of this treasure, why we may not continually rebuke the infidelity and despair, in ourselves and in all men, which refuse to lay hold of it.

‘I know all that is said about the impossibility of bringing home to the minds of common people any thought of eternal life which does not identify it with happiness, about "mystical ideas which are very well for refined ladies and gentlemen, but can never be [presented] to the poor," and so on. Supposing the objection is true, it must be carried much further. The people being fond of beer and gin, and connecting these with their notions of happiness, you must promise them future felicity in beer and gin. Heaven must be an endless succession of drunken bouts and revelries. But the fact is that there is that in every drunkard which cries for salvation from drunkenness: there is a man within him who wants another life, and who at the same time confesses his incapacity to rise to that other life. Speak to the brute in him and you must of course speak as Tetzelspoke, of indulgences for his brutality which he may buy of some Popish or Protestant hawker. And you must have hawkers suited to the different tastes of our population; one set for St. Giles, one for Belgravia; each with his own wares, each trying to undersell the other; all alike in this, that they appeal to that which is sordid, grovelling, cowardly in their hearers; all alike in this, that they make their religion into an instrument for cultivating and developing these instincts. If you speak to the human being in the inhabitant of Belgravia or St. Giles, I do not say that he will always answer you. It may be a long time before you get to understand him, or he to understand you. But, I do say that the message of God's kingdom, the message of eternal life, will reach him as no message about happiness ever will. I say that this message has formed Christendom, that this was at the root of the Reformation in the sixteenth century, that this, more fully, frankly, simply stated, must be at the root of any reformation in the nineteenth century, which shall renovate and revive Christendom.

‘It is not the poor who misunderstand the good news that was at first preached to them. To them it does make itself intelligible through their physical and moral degradation. The rich and the comfortable man or woman—above all the rich and comfortable priest—is the person who protests that any Heaven but one of future indulgence and enjoyment to be procured by certain sacrifices of present indulgence and enjoyment, is incredible to him. It does become incredible to him, till he discovers that his Heaven is one from which the devil has not been cast out, but in which he reigns supreme.

‘Hope for ourselves, hope for all ; but hope of life, not of death, of a real Heaven, not of a Heaven which is a pleasant hell ; this is what we want ; this the spirit of God would keep alive within us.’

To the same Clergyman (in answer to a question as to the possibility of sorrow in Heaven).

‘DEAR MR. —,

‘July 13, 1866.

‘I would only say one word in qualification of, or rather in addition to, what you observe, rightly and wisely, about the possible sorrow which may mingle with the future state of many who have entered or are entering into the eternal life which Christ has proclaimed. It is this: I would never withhold from any sufferer the promise of a complete redemption of the body from the death wherein we here groan, being burdened. Whenever or in whatever way that redemption may come, I hold it [to] be involved in the very existence of a frame so curiously and wonderfully made as ours is, and most unhappily hidden from us by the language about the soul, which we have borrowed from heathens rather than from the Scriptures. The hope of freedom from pain may not be in itself at all a sufficient one ; but if its ground is a hope in God, the deliverer of man from every curse, the only end for which pain is permitted seems to be attained. All our Lord’s cures appear to point this way. They are a vindication of the order of the universe, which sickness and pain have disturbed. They awaken faith in the author of the order, confidence that He will not suffer His own work to perish.

‘Your friends who suspect that they are in danger of losing heaven if our Lord’s words respecting the Kingdom of Heaven and eternal life be taken strictly, should ask themselves seriously whether heaven has not been separated from God, whether “the land of pure delight where saints immortal reign” is not a poor copy of Pindar’s splendid poetry in the second Olympic ode, and is anything like "my Father's house with many mansions, to which I go to prepare a place for you." Doctrines about heaven or earth which are separated from trust in the Creator of heaven and earth, and in Christ in whom heaven and earth are reconciled, had better perish—the sooner we can get rid of them the better. But these are negative doctrines—opinions which we hold by dint of tradition or argument, not a faith which upholds us when we are most feeble and tottering. Of that faith no man or devil can deprive us.'

To Rev. J. H. MacMahon (in answer to a letter, asking my father to give advice to some young Methodist preachers who were thinking of joining the English Church).

'Rev. H. Prentice's, Burnham, Maidenhead, August 5, 1866.

'I wish I could see my way to advise the young men of whom you speak. I should like much, if I might, to see them, and talk with them, when I return to London. But it would not be for the purpose of withdrawing them from any position in which they are, if they find that they can hold it, or of bringing them into our communion, which might not be a communion to them; alas! how little it is to any of us. I prize the Church of England very greatly, because it bears continual witness to the truths which we, its members, are most habitually denying; because it testifies for that unity in Christ with the whole family in heaven and earth which we by our acts and words are seeking to destroy.

'I do not think the Bishop of London means to keep any out of the fold. I think he would gladly recognise all different shades of belief within our body and claim all who lie outside of it as belonging to it, if he knew how. But he is bewildered, as we all are. We must be humbled utterly in our own conceits before we can be peacemakers. The Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments (yes, the Ten Commandments in spite of all modern theories to the contrary), seem to me the true witnesses of a universal fellowship, as well as of a national fellowship; the Sacraments, the pledges of its reality through all ages past and to come. But God must be first, not the Church, if the Church is to be anything but a collection of dry bones rattling against each other, and presenting to the world the spectacle of confusion and death such as it can see nowhere else.

‘If we can once learn to think of heaven as of a Father’s house, not as of a place where certain prizes are dealt out to those who calculate well [on] earth, or are supremely lucky, if we once could believe that Christ means that God’s will should be done on earth as it is in heaven, and that there should be a deliverance from evil, what different people we should be!

‘I ought to say as to the practical question that King’s College is the easiest and most satisfactory way on the whole for those to qualify themselves for orders who cannot afford Oxford or Cambridge. May God bless you and support you in your heavy trial.’

To Mr. Ludlow.

‘Burnham, Maidenhead, September 6, 1866.

‘I have been writing a book on the Commandments, which have occupied my mind very much lately. It will be dedicated to Dr. Macleod that I may express my great respect for him, and my utter dissent from his doctrines about the abolition of the Decalogue for Christians. It seems to me that if we lose them the connection between theology and national life is dissolved.’

CHAPTER XVII.

A CHAPTER WITHOUT DATE, BEING A GATHERING OF FALLACIES.

"Who has ever forgotten those lines of Tacitus; inserted as a small, transitory, altogether trifling circumstance in the history of such a potentate as Nero? To us it is the most earnest, sad, and sternly significant passage, that we know to exist in writing:

"Ergo abolendo rumori Nero subdidit reos, et quæsitissimis pœnis affecit, quos per flagitia invisos vulgus CHRISTIANOS appellabat. Auctor nominis ejus CHRISTUS, qui, Tiberio imperitante, per Procuratorem Pontium Pilatum supplicio affectus erat. Repressaque in præsens exitiabilis superstitio rursus erumpebat, non modo per Judæam originem ejus mali, sed per urbem etiam, quo cuncta undique atrociora aut pudenda confluunt, celebranturque."

"So for the quieting of this rumour [of his having set fire to Rome], Nero judicially charged with the crime, and punished with most studied cruelties, that class hated for their general wickedness, whom the vulgar used to call Christians. The originator of that name was one Christ, who, in the reign of Tiberius, suffered death by sentence of the Procurator, Pontius Pilate. The baneful superstition, thereby repressed for the time, again broke out, not only over Judæa, the native soil of that mischief, but in the City also, where from every side all atrocious and abominable things collect and flourish."

"Tacitus was the wisest, most penetrating man of his generation; and to such depth, and no deeper, has he seen into this transaction, the most important that has occurred or can occur in the annals of mankind."—Carlyle's Essay on Voltaire.

ALLUSION has been made from time to time to the various newspaper attacks upon my father and his friends. No picture of the life would be complete which did not give a certain prominence to these; but altogether apart from them and among people who had no desire to misrepresent my father, there were quaint misunderstandings of him of which it will be convenient to record a few. They are scarcely of sufficient importance to be mentioned separately in connection with the course of the life; but, taken together, they serve a double purpose: they complete the record of his relation to his time, and they will be welcome as studies of the ways of mankind to any one who has hereafter to fight similar battles. I believe that these misunderstandings were for the most part due to certain circumstances which I now propose to describe.

From a variety of causes it had come to pass that during a considerable part of my father's life society almost demanded of one who did not wish to "argue himself unknown" that he should know something about my father. But as he was simply a London clergyman, not wealthy, not conspicuous in any of the ordinary ways, as he could not be defined by any party name, it was not very easy to get him and all about him conveniently within a nutshell. It was provoking to be obliged to know about him. A few solved the difficulty by dubbing him a Broad-Churchman, not that they had the faintest notion what they meant by the phrase, but that at least it was an expression in common use, and so one might be supposed to know something about it. To read his books would have been chiefly to read thoughts thrown into the form of sermons, and the very idea of a sermon was nauseous to most of the very people whom he tried to reach, while the mass of those to whom the idea of a sermon was not nauseous were completely under the leadership of the very men of party and of shibboleths against whose sectarianism he was fighting. Hence those who found it desirable to be able sometimes to "know all about him," in the drawing-room sense of the term, were very glad to accept from any quarter a report that would pass muster.

A second-hand knowledge of him, chiefly acquired indirectly from the attacks of those who had reason enough to dread him, was very widely spread. At the same time a very great many people in all parts of the country and indeed of the world were warmly attached to him, either through personal intercourse, through real knowledge of his books, or through the ever widening circles which had been affected by the cooperative movement, the working men's college movement, the ladies' education movement, or by acquaintance with his King's College or at a later time with his University pupils.

This curious result was produced: that on the one hand the statements about his opinions, his motives, and the nature of his faith furnished by the religious newspapers, were supposed to be correct and had, through the country clergy, and through the lay newspapers, which took their religion at secondhand from their "religious" contemporaries, reached thousands who were quite unaware of the source from which the information was derived; and, on the other hand, an impression of his high personal character and of his attractiveness was quite as widely spread as these absolutely false reports of the nature of his opinions and of his faith. The consequence in not a few instances was most disastrous; not for him, but in its effects upon the faith of the time. The particular method of attack which had been pursued by the Record, which had been taken up even by the 'Quarterly,' was not to argue against the actual beliefs which he held and to show that these were false, but to misstate and often directly to invert that which he was setting forward as truth. In numbers of instances young men who were weary of the party cries of the clique in which they had been educated, hearing that a man of such high character and so much influence believed the monstrous doctrines which were imputed to him, adopted these either on his supposed authority or at least encouraged by his supposed approval. It was for a long time one of the greatest troubles that my father had at the Working Men's College that so many of the men who came there had acquired impressions of this kind.

In addition to this influence produced on those who had not read my father's books, the indirect effect upon numbers who did look at some of them was very marked. Understanding that the books were to be taken in the sense which his critics attributed to them, these readers assumed that the volumes were everywhere to be read between the lines. Those thoughts which were to my father everything, which were the outpourings of his inmost heart, which are always more full and ample in his correspondence than in his books, and freer in his correspondence in proportion as it is more intimate and private, all those words which set forth what were to him certainties, were assumed to be merely perfunctory parts of a clergyman's duty. He who was always encouraging the full statement of every honest doubt—his own or that of others—in the sure conviction that in clear daylight the false must perish, the true flourish, was supposed "to mean more than he said;" in other words, to be propping the doubts at whose roots he was hacking. But from time to time his words, either spoken or written, or his acts, broke through this impression, and the outpouring of what were to him realities, in which he literally lived, the things of which it was his duty as a clergyman to speak, forced its way home as genuine even to those who came with all preconceived impressions about him. The only solution which cleared the difficulty was then adopted. These good people "could not understand him." There was not the slightest pretence at any time that his English was not lucid, that his sentences were unfinished, or that any particular sentence did not convey a specific meaning. It was not his words but himself—the general upshot of what he was striving after—that to many people was unintelligible. At a particular stage of this matter an ingenious writer imagined a set of people who professed to understand that which to others was, as they the enlightened well believed, incomprehensible. Such a set of people had no existence in fact; though many men undoubtedly found no difficulty in understanding a writer whom others did not understand. The whole difference lay in this, that those who understood him believed his own statement of his general purpose and scope and, seeing him nearly, had known for years with how intense a devotion he clung to it: that those who did not understand him either talked about him à la mode without having ever taken the trouble to master what he said at all, or else took their knowledge of what he had SAID from some one or other or his books, and their knowledge of what he MEANT at second of third or fourth hand from the Record, or from Mr. Rigga, a Wesleyan minister, whose books were occasionally distributed, by most pious persons, as warnings to young men of the plagues they were to flee from.

But though the central fact in this matter lay in the difficulty in understanding my father as a whole rather than in understanding his words, it would be very untrue not to acknowledge that there were certain elements in his writings themselves which tended to produce the same result.

In the first place, by the time that he went as an undergraduate to Cambridge, many of the convictions and impressions were already formed or dormant in him, which, though they subsequently took various shapes and colours, remained the substantive portion of his thoughts throughout life. Most Englishmen, during the same period of life, acquire the habit of using a number of expressions and phrases, connected with their own particular public schools, or with some similar factor in their education. To these phrases they attach rather a particular use than a particular meaning. Indeed it may be doubted whether most of us distinguish between the two terms. Now supposing a youth, educated under conditions which induced him to adopt an unusual set of phrases to be thrown into intimate association with a great number of young men just at the time of life when anything out of the common is most sure to be freely challenged, what would necessarily happen?

First, of course, that the exceptional man would have continually to give an account of his peculiar expressions, and would in all probability be forced for the first time in his life to consider what he did actually mean by them. Secondly, that he should begin to ask "for change" for the expressions he found so freely used around him. Thirdly, that having once begun this process and having found that he and others learnt a good deal by it, the thing should become habitual with him.

Now it happens that this was just my father's case. In the sense in which he quotes from Irving the expression that "the Old Testament is the dictionary of the New" it is true also that Mrs. Michael Maurice's letters are the dictionary of her son's writings. In those which I have given, her use of "principles," "everlasting," "Gospel," "eternal life," are quite as unlike the conventional use of her day as her son's use of them was unlike the conventional use of his time. I believe I am right in saying that many other expressions such as "honest," "persons and things," etc., which he sometimes uses in a rather peculiar sense, might be similarly traced back to the habit of his boyhood. Far more marked than the mere use of these words, in its effect upon his writings, was the habit of not adopting the current phrases of his time where he was not satisfied that people attached a definite and a true meaning to them. More especially the abusive titles which are flung about as projectiles of party warfare were weapons which he never used. Instead of assuming that all who differed from him were of one mind, involved in one common error, he believed that the only means he had of knowing any truth at all was the seeing by that light which was also granted to every other human being. He could not therefore consistently epitomise in one word of condemnation the many truths, half-truths and confusions, which he believed to be included in the thoughts of others as in his own. But the odd thing about it is that he never himself realised that this made his writings much harder and not much easier to read in the way men ordinarily read. He never realised the glorious simplicity which follows from that division of all men into the two classes of "we" and "the rest," "Greeks and Barbarians," "Jews and Gentiles," which we most of us adopt. He always in his many indignant denials of that which he regarded as almost a criminal charge—the accusation that he was PURPOSELY obscure—pleads his habit of demanding and giving change for all phrases. As if avoiding the phrases of an age tended to make your writings seem easier to read in that age!

A scholar of some mark said to me a short time ago, "You mean that your father was not an eclectic! Well, I think I am!" My father's place in the world was quite fixed after that had been said. It is only necessary to remove the words "an eclectic" from that sentence, and to insert "a High Churchman," "a Low Churchman," "an Agnostic," "a Broad Churchman," "a Baptist," etc. etc. My father's position could then with equal certainty be fixed from many points of view. Still there was an uncomfortable feeling left always that he was not fixed at all but would attack you from inside, not from outside the ring. As one has put it: "He ought to be one of 'those others'* who have neither part nor lot with us, who are only anathema; but he has such an offensive trick of becoming personal: that is to say, he deals with one not as a classified specimen of the genus homo but as a man. He uses the arguments of our set, just those which one had always taken for granted that those others knew nothing of, and he appeals to one's own conscience and one's own experience, not denouncing what we hold sacred, but treating it as if it were sacred."

How could you get rid of such a nuisance except by "not being able to understand him"?

There was yet another cause of difficulty in understanding him, connected with his avoiding party names, which needs further statement.

If a man slashes about him vigorously, distributing to all those, with whom he does not agree, titles which class them among people whom his readers already disapprove, there is not much difficulty in understanding him in one specific sense. Men agree to repeat their disapproval of those whom they already disapprove, and feel, when the new victim is classed among these, that he too deserves to be placed under the ban. Now, there is no use in understating the fact that the whole question between Atheism and Faith was for my father involved in his dealing with this matter. Not only did his extreme reverence for minorities, as frequently the depositories of truths yet destined to conquer the world, prevent him from speaking unfairly of any men, no matter how little their influence might be; but, since Truth, as He reveals Himself to man, was the object of his search and of his worship, to refuse to listen to any voice that might have caught some side of truth so revealed, and to do this because public opinion had not decreed the wisdom of that voice, seemed to him simply to choose the praise of men rather than that of God. Hence his constant effort always to take account of and to allude to all sorts of statements and views of truth with which most men do not concern themselves at all. Combined with this, a habit of alluding to all such matters without specifically stating exactly to what he refers, helped often to make his meaning troublesome to follow without close attention. This habit of allusion, which was so established that he needs editing almost like a classical author, was I believe due entirely to his intense modesty. He was always afraid of speaking as if he knew more than others, and therefore there is a continually suppressed "as of course you know much better than I know it" which stops his entering into an elaborate explanation. Hence the double result that he would often pay respectful notice to an aspect of truth quite unknown to his readers, and would yet not adequately explain what it was.

* The favourite expression of the Ulster Orangemen in regard to the Roman Catholics.

Again when once the decree has gone forth that a man is hard to understand, it is amazing how his simplest statements are supposed to be difficult. I had an instance of this in sending round some of the proof-sheets of this book to a few of my father's most intimate friends. A certain passage in a letter about Sterling (p. 196, Vol. I), contains the statement that Sterling had long "looked upon death as the true end of death." The thought is, I almost venture to say, if not the very most frequent of all in all our older poets, at least one of the most frequent. It occurs many times in a single play of Shakespeare, again in the sonnets; in Milton; in Donne; etc. etc., and yet so obscure did it appear when my father used it that several of a very select body of readers in order to get rid of the obscurity proposed as an emendation "life" instead of "death" at the end of the sentence, reducing it to an unmeaning platitude. Again, I have quoted as a chapter-heading a striking expression of Mr. Hutton's to the effect that it is the grasp truths have on them for which men are ready to die; the grasp they have on truths is a very secondary matter. I hope this will not be unintelligible; but when my father, in a letter to one of his sisters from Oxford in 1833, spoke of "a truth which I had apprehended but which had not apprehended me," and added, "I do not know whether you understand the difference, but a difference there is," I was obliged to suppress a rather valuable and striking letter which had appeared in the first proof lest the letter should be supposed to be unintelligible because of this one sentence. Yet the thought is identical with Mr. Hutton's.

Certainly on the other hand the assumption that people made that they "knew all about him," without ever having read a line of his writings, sometimes had queer results. I shall take as my first specimen of that kind an instance of which the aspect is purely comic.

It happened that one of Mr. Maurice's sons was for some time living in a country district in Ireland, where a young lady whom he had known before was paying a visit to friends in the neighbourhood. The mistress of the house took considerable pains to avoid meeting him or allowing her visitor to meet him, because, as she explained to her guest, he could not possibly be a desirable acquaintance, since Mr. Maurice, his father, "was a man who had written a book about natural history in which the name of God was not mentioned from one end to the other." My father had, when really amused, a specially hearty laugh, which began with an apparent effort to resist the overmastering sense of humour, and ended in complete surrender to it; but hearty as his laugh often was, I doubt if he ever laughed more heartily than over that story when it was told him. His helpless ignorance on the subject on which he was supposed to have written, the grave conclusion as to the action to be taken to prevent the spread of such evil infection, the sense that, after all, the thing was a not very exaggerated specimen of what "public opinion" continually is, and of the readiness of its worshippers to act on its false assertions, all combined to give him a thorough satisfaction in yielding to the mere sense of the absurdity of the thing, and he laughed with a heartiness that was to be remembered.

Perhaps as a stepping-stone between that story and graver matters it will be not inconvenient to take next a specimen from Punch. There were certain lines of thought of my father's which lent themselves very easily to travestie. The assertion that he put forward of the existence of a faculty capable of distinguishing between spiritual truth and falsehood, between right and wrong, which he believed to be universal among men, however much obscured it may often have become; his belief that this faculty is independent of the intellect, often made him refer back in thought to the sick-beds of Guy's, of his sister Emma or of others whom he had known, and to speak of "the bed-ridden woman" to whom truth revealed itself because of her need and not because of her intellect. Punch more than once struck in vigorously on my father's side of questions; perhaps the most beautiful lines of poetry that were written after his death appeared in Punch, so that certainly his friends have no cause to complain of his treatment by the great comic newspaper; but as an illustration of the special tendency of popular misunderstanding to invert his thoughts, it is worth referring to some funny lines in which in a dialogue with Dean Close he is made to say that 'there is a sense in which truths are to be understood by learned men, and quite another for the outside vulgar.' It would have been easy to have made a genuine hit, and for Punch a perfectly fair one, by putting into his mouth some such sentence as—"There is a bed-ridden old woman of my acquaintance, an idiot, and not a very respectable person, who understands all these things. None of the wise and good are to be trusted on such subjects."

Curiously enough, the exact inverse of Punch's charge was put forward after his death gravely, not as a travestie but as a serious statement of what he habitually did by an old pupil of his. Mr. Leslie Stephen actually declared that he habitually appealed to "old women" against the opinions of learned men.

* "The Gullibility of the Public has no bounds." Said by the Prince Consort at a time when Mr. Roebuck, representing for the moment the majority of the House of Commons, declared his belief that the Queen and Prince were endeavouring to procure the defeat of our army in the Crimea!

It is extremely difficult to understand such a phrase not in the Punch connection. There is not a trace of an instance in all his writings in which he does not appeal to the ablest men, to the greatest men, to the most learned men on each subject of thought on which they are masters. Any one who will turn to the letters either to Sir E. Strachey, or to Dr. Barry in Vol. I., or to any others in which he is giving advice as to study, will see that this is his special peculiarity, his strongest feeling. One hardly knows how, without apparent satire, to explain the misconception to so able a man as Mr. Stephen; but as he is representative of one type of men who very readily misconceived my father, it had perhaps better be said that while my father never dreamed of appealing to the intellectual authority of any but the most able men, he did not believe that the world had been made for the sole benefit of the class to which Mr. Stephen belongs. Just as he objected to a clique of Calvinistic saints or High-Church saints monopolising a message which he believed had been sent to man, so he objected to a cultivated intellectual clique thinking that they could without the least entering into the troubles or work of mankind settle in their arm-chairs how the world ought to have been arranged. He spoke from personal experience when he said that in attending sick-beds, in meeting men and women overladen with appalling misery, he had learned lessons which no learned men could teach him. Those who have made this experiment and have found it fail them have some right to bring forward evidence against my father. Unless those who object to his statement are able to speak of such experience, it is a question between the relative value of fine-spun logic as to what ought to be the case against direct evidence of fact. As a question of theory the decision of that relative value may be left, not to the old women but to the most learned audience that can be selected. Following my father's actual as opposed to his alleged practice, I should prefer to refer that question to lawyers and judges. It is against the principles which they have laid down for generations that Mr. Stephen's scoff is really directed.

More than once my father utterly refused to discuss mere intellectual puzzles submitted to him. He did not profess to be a supplier of an infallible solution for every such difficulty, but to be a messenger urging men to trust themselves to another, not himself, who would lead them into all truth. Rightly or wrongly, he fancied that He sometimes made Himself known to the weak in body and mind and to the suffering. Moreover, not being specially weak in either himself, he believed it to be historically true that the "foolish things of this world" have, more often than not, been "chosen to confound the wise," and "the things that are not to bring to nought the things that are."

Passing from these matters, all somewhat trivial, I ought perhaps to note as an illustration of the misconceptions which are apt to attend a writer who does not confine his words to a repetition of the current shibboleths, that a man of the last generation, not much known beyond Cambridge, for whom all who did know him had the most profound reverence—Mr. Ellis—actually so far misconceived my father as to suppose that he did not believe in a future world. It would have been much nearer the truth, if such an expression is possible, to say that he did not believe in the present world. But I may leave his letters to speak of this. It is only the misconception of so able and good a man that I wish here to chronicle. After the heading I have placed to this chapter, one would be unreasonable to complain of anything of the kind.

And yet here I must confess is a statement—the last I shall give—which may almost startle one out of any such feeling. It will have been seen with how much affection my father writes of Mr. McLeod Campbell; how much he thought he had learned from him, how he valued all the intercourse he had with him. It was to my father that Mr. Campbell sent his book on the Atonement to arrange for a publisher for it. My father always signs his letters to him "yours affectionately." Mr. Campbell in 1866 wrote warmly to express his pleasure at my father's being appointed to Cambridge. In 1853 he had spoken of my father as the "foremost man" in the English Church, "the only man who is attempting to deal with the mental difficulties of his generation in a free and fair spirit;" and again, "As to the moral tendency of Mr. Maurice's teaching on this subject [Eternal Life and Eternal Death], I cannot see that in identifying sin and death, holiness and life, he has done other than a great and needed service for our time." Memorials, Vol. I., p. 257. Yet from his worst enemy during all his life there never was brought against him such a charge as this, which I now give, delivered, apparently in 1864, against my father, reported as it is by Principal Shairp as part of a conversation with Mr. Campbell.

* See letter on occupations of future life, p. 242, Vol. II.

"Then he [Mr. Campbell] added, 'those who, like Maurice, regard Christ's work as only taking away our alienation, by making us see the Father's eternal good will toward us, as this only and no more, they take no account of the sense of guilt in man. According to their view there is nothing real in the nature of things answering to this sense of guilt. The sense of guilt becomes a mistake which further knowledge removes. All sin is thus reduced to ignorance.'"

That the first part which I have not italicised is not a true report of my father's theology or any semblance of a true report, no one who cares about such matters and has read the letters in this biography needs to be told. On this however there is no need to dwell.

The second part, which I have italicised, either concerns the daily practical life of every Englishman and of every Englishwoman, or it has no meaning in connection with anything of which my father ever spoke. Either it means that the work to which he had set himself throughout life was to persuade men that impurity, falsehood, robbery, murder were things of no consequence; that he taught men that when they knew a little more they would understand that these things did not matter at all—or it has no meaning. Now I am bound to say that when this tremendous charge was said to have been brought by one who had, during his lifetime, been supposed to be one of my father's personal friends, who was one of the dearest friends of Mr. Erskine of Linlathen, I thought that Principal Shairp must have made some mistake. That view was shared by many. Principal Shairp had had no personal acquaintance with my father; I have now no reason to suppose that he ever had any knowledge of my father's character or of his work. He might quite likely suppose, as other excellent persons have done, that my father was the wicked man he here describes. It is quite clear from other parts of the letter that he thought it right to try very earnestly to save Mr. Campbell from being supposed to agree with my father. But I ought to add, that Principal Shairp has informed me, that the words were written down from a conversation with Mr. Campbell, the day after it took place, and that Mr. Donald Campbell, Mr. McLeod Campbell's son and biographer, tells me—incredible as it may appear—that neither he, nor any of the friends to whom he has spoken, had any idea that my father, or any of his friends, would have objected to this statement of his action.*

If I could suppose that no one would turn to the index of this book, find this passage and read it alone, without reading any other part of the life or letters, and that no one would read this first and then read the rest under the impression of it, I should be content to say no more; and to leave this as I have done other statements of the kind to go to their own place. But as this is just the point of which I cannot be sure, I may say this: that among all my father's writings published, and among all the letters published or unpublished, there is not one passage in which allusion to the subject is made, where sin or the guilt of sin is not treated as the most tremendous reality. There is not one passage that can be quoted in which every common-sense Englishman, when the context is fairly laid before him, will not say that it is a directly false pretence to allege that the meaning on this subject is open to doubt. It is the characteristic feature of all my father's reference to sin that it appears to him so tremendous a reality, so tremendous an evil, that he can conceive of no punishment which will not be a blessing for which God is to be thanked so long as it will tend to relieve men from this curse of sin.

* The strange thing is, that they neither of them seem to realise the tremendous charge they bring against Mr. Campbell, that he remained for years on terms of intimacy with my father while he believed this of him.

Mr. Shairp's quotation from Mr. Campbell is at all events quite clear, lucidly clear. I have put the passage into the hands of many men. No one of us ever for an instant hesitated as to its meaning. I say that, as it stands, without any interpretation of mine, I may leave any reader of these two volumes to find a dozen passages which in set terms explicitly assert the opposite of it. There is a tolerably known chapter in the 'Theological Essays' which entirely turns upon the assertion of the reverse of what is put in Mr. Shairp's or Mr. Campbell's words as my father's belief. I hope at all events that I am not here unintelligible. As sometimes the words of a second writer help to bring home the point of an author's thought better than a reference to his own, I may say that one side of my father's thought in this matter is most beautifully expressed in a sermon called "The Fire and the Calf," in the volume of 'Sermons preached in English Churches' by the Rev. Phillips Brooks, of Trinity Church, Boston. The other side is that which he himself puts as the one true confession of guilt. "Father I have sinned against Thee," Theological Essays, p. 23. Of his sense of sin as a transgression of Law, one of the strongest feelings he had, the book on the Commandments and his vehement assertion of their authority are the best evidences.

I hope that I have said nothing not necessary to the vindication of my father that can give pain to any of Mr. Campbell's friends. I cannot explain the mistake of so excellent a man. I am sure that if my father had had the statement before him, he would, despite the anguish the charge from such a quarter would have caused him, have had the most anxious wish that no word should be said to wound Mr. Campbell's memory. But for his own use as a lesson of the terrible misconceptions of one another, which are so common among the best of men, the incident would, like so many others, have awakened that refrain from the Mount which was for ever ringing in his ears—"Judge not that ye be not judged."*

* There was one very characteristic difference of mind between my father and Mr. Campbell. Mr. Campbell, in discussing my father's use of the word 'Eternal,' fixes first for himself on à priori grounds either of etymology or general scholarship, at all events on some unnamed grounds, the meaning which the word ought to have and must have in its use by Christ. Now in reading Cicero or Thucydides, or Plato, that was not my father's habit. The thing, which he both did himself, and endeavoured to induce his pupils to do, was to study the use of each word by the writer himself; to find, if possible, a use of it by the writer so determinative of its meaning that it must rule all the rest; and then to see the finer shades of meaning attached to the word as illustrated by other uses. His whole effort was thus to train his pupil to the habit of making himself acquainted with the mind of the author studied. He never believed in an absolute dictionary sense of a word. I think, as he himself has in fact suggested, that Hare's training tended to this habit; but far more important in fixing it was that practical training in his meeting at first with Cambridge Undergraduates, especially with the members of the 'Apostles club,' which I have discussed at the beginning of this chapter, to which he habitually declared that he was more indebted than to almost any other experience of life. But the reverent study which he thus made of Cicero, was as nothing to the study which he devoted to the mind of Christ, as shewn forth in the words and acts attributed to him. The belief he acquired, was that the one purpose for which Christ came was the revelation of an unseen kingdom and an unseen king, then, now and always 'at hand.' He thought that, though "Pilate did not wait for an answer," as to what the 'Truth' was (to bear witness to which Christ then declared that he had come into the world), the answer had been already given "I am the Truth," "I am the King." It seemed to him that the adoption of the word 'Eternal,' to describe the life of this kingdom, was a thing to be studied in its use by Christ, and those who had learned from him, and that to determine beforehand what the word ought to mean, from its use by others or by its etymology, is just as reasonable as to decide, that, by calling himself a king, Christ meant us to think of him as surrounded by the ordinary trappings of earthly royalty.

CHAPTER XVIII.

“Old Age hath yet his honour and his toil.”

Tennyson's Ulysses.

ELECTION TO KNIGHTSBRIDGE PROFESSORSHIP, CAMBRIDGE — ON MAZZINI—F. D. M.'S REVIEW OF THE WORK DONE SIXTEEN YEARS BEFORE—MEETING AT WORKING MEN'S COLLEGE—INAUGURAL LECTURE IN SENATE HOUSE—HABITS AND PERSONAL APPEARANCE AT THIS TIME—DEMOCRACY—ON THE POSSIBILITY OF SORROW IN HEAVEN AND ON ST. PAUL'S ACCOUNT OF THE RESURRECTION—ON THE REPULSION PRODUCED ON DISSENTERS BY THE ATHANASIAN CREED.

IN September 1866, the Knightsbridge Professorship of “Casuistry, Moral Theology and Moral Philosophy” at Cambridge fell vacant by the death of Mr. Grote. I suppose that if at that particular time all the honours that men confer could have been offered to my father's choice, an appointment by the University of Cambridge to one of its chairs of Theology or Moral Philosophy would have been the one he would have selected from among them all. He was not merely indifferent to any personal preferment; he had deliberately set his face against receiving any. But he had the keenest wish for human sympathy; to Cambridge his eyes had always turned for it. The careless and scarcely decent haste with which a body of not very learned laymen had, in 1853, pronounced upon one of the most profound and difficult of questions, had made the election by Cambridge of the rejected of King's College a matter of no small importance, as in the sight of all men reducing the haste at least of the earlier decision to the proportions of merely impertinent frivolity. The tone of superiority, of contemptuous condescension with which in their controversy Mr. Mansel had treated him, and my father's unlimited self-depreciation, only too easy to be misunderstood, had put that matter on such a footing that Mr. Mansel appeared perfectly justified in the tone he had taken, if it was the fact that he had been engaged in controversy with an ignorant pariah, and under any other circumstances Mr. Mansel had manifestly transgressed all the ordinary courtesies of modern life. Election by a University itself was as complete an answer as the authority of man could well supply as to which mode of treatment was demanded by the intellectual status of the controversialist.

I think that despite my father's shy and self-ignoring habit of mind, these feelings acted to some extent upon him; they very powerfully affected his friends; but what to him was the greatest delight which the prospect offered was the possibility of resuming among young men a work so long interrupted.

He had however at first no intention of standing, and after the vacancy had been declared, allowed a considerable time to elapse, during which pledges to vote for particular men were given by electors. He was finally persuaded to send in his name by a letter of October 17th, from Mr. Kingsley, himself one of the electors, and by Mr. Davies.

‘MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

‘October 18, 1866.

‘Your letter took me quite by surprise. The day before Davies had given me the first hint of trying for the Professorship. I had many doubts whether I should not be supposed to be doing a most presumptuous and unreasonable thing. But, at the suggestion of Davies, I wrote to Clark to ask whether my Oxford degree did not make me ineligible. And when I returned home, after sending this note to him, I found your most cordial letter. I do hope you are not urging me to a step which will bring you or any of my friends into disgrace, and that I am not rashly undertaking what I cannot perform. At sixty-one I am perhaps past such work, yet I do think I might be able to do it if it were entrusted to me. I hope God will not permit me to have it if I am not fit for it. I had determined not to ask your opinion about standing, much as I desired it, lest I should put you into an uncomfortable position. But your very kind letter this morning (of course I had not received it when I wrote) leaves me nothing to do but to wait quietly. I shall rejoice, with immense wonder and some fear, if your expectations should be fulfilled. I shall be certain that it is right, and, I trust, feel very thankful also if the electors should judge it wiser to reject me. They must indeed be brave men if they will accept an expelled professor for one of their body.

‘I do not know whether a short book I have just been writing on the Commandments will please or displease them. It expresses my inmost convictions that the old Commandments are the best protection against sacerdotal morality, and for the morality of the household and the nation. I hope you will approve it.

‘To work with you would be a very great pleasure, that you should wish me to do so is quite a sufficient one.’

He rested his formal application for the chair expressly on his ‘Theological Essays,’ ‘What is Revelation?’ the ‘Sequel to what is Revelation?’ and the ‘Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy.’ The questions therefore of King’s College and of Mansel were specifically raised, not, of course, in such sense as to commit, by their choice of him, either the electors or the University to agreement with his views; the Council of King’s College and Mr. Mansel had taken care, by their mode of action, that under any circumstances, and apart from the merits of either controversy, the effect of the vote of the University, if in his favour, should be for them a sufficiently strong condemnation. Under this aspect, the effect of his election would be the stronger, from the fact of his being, by degree, an Oxford man.

The electors were :

The Vice Chancellor.

The Regius Professor of Greek (Dr. Thompson).

The Master of Peterhouse.

The Regius Professor of Divinity.

The Margaret Professor of Divinity (Rev. W. Selwyn).

The Public Orator (Rev. W. G. Clark),

And the Regius Professor of Modern History (Rev. C. Kingsley).

Mr. Kingsley, when writing on October 17th, had said that the election turned upon the question how many of the electors were already absolutely pledged. "But I can assure you that such is the respect and admiration in which you are held in Cambridge, and so well aware are educated men of the claims which your learning alone gives you on them, that the introduction of your name would cause a reconsideration of the whole list of candidates."

On October 25th a telegram from the Public Orator and Mr. Kingsley told him of his election. Of the seven electors, one had voted for another candidate, a man of his own college ; four had then voted for my father, and the election having been thus determined, the other two had not actually voted at all, but had at once cordially approved.

Mr. Kingsley wrote, "Your triumph could not have been more complete." "My heart is as full as a boy's—I thought I should have been 'upset' when I saw the result."

Then letters poured in to assure him that the electors had only given expression to the wish of the University as a body. Of his two most serious competitors, the one who had probably the best chance of election wrote, "I had sent in my name before I had any notion that you were likely to be a candidate, but if by any chance I had been elected when you were in the field I should have felt like a schoolboy sitting in his master's chair, for all the best part of my teaching to others would have consisted in what I had learnt from you or from Coleridge." The other, Mr. Hort, had at once, on hearing of my father's candidature, released one of the electors from a promise to vote for him, and wrote to my father to say that the only reason he had retained his name as a candidate after my father's had been sent in, was that he and one or two others whom he had consulted had doubted if more than three of the electors—Mr. Kingsley, Mr. Clark the Public Orator, and Dr. Thompson The Master of Trinity—would have had the "moral courage" to vote for him; though they all recognised that when he had entered the field there could be no further question on the merits of the case. It is very remarkable in how very many of these letters this question of "moral courage" is raised. One writer after another speaks with a kind of relief of the fact that four electors should have been found of sufficient "moral courage" to do what all felt was the right thing. The tone of feeling is almost like that which Carlyle ascribes to the friends of order who, when they at last descended into the streets against the Terrorists, were amazed to find how many they were.

It is necessary to say one word more about this. In any case which concerned himself, my father always treated it as the most natural thing in the world that he should be passed by; and he received with a genuine surprise any recognition whatever; but in all the other concerns of life the absence of "moral courage," which was so generally assumed as the natural thing to be expected, was specifically what he meant by the Atheism of the time. That the clergy should be daily preaching of an Almighty God, who was about their path and about their bed, and spying out all their ways, and that then, on the first occasion when it was necessary for them to determine whether they would do the right thing or flinch and quaver before so base a thing, as they well knew the anonymous writing of the religious newspapers to be—this filled him continually with a sense of a coming avalanche, under which all the mock belief in God should be buried, and afterwards in quite simple form would come out the old question between the praise of men and the praise of God. He himself has been certainly the object of more of this which is euphuistically called "moral cowardice" than any man of his time. To this day, my attention is continually being drawn by friends to the fact, that his 'Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy' is plundered, without acknowledgment, because while his name is honoured in all directions, the particular plunderer has a cowardly sense that he might possibly, if he named the source of his quotation, offend some religious journal against which my father fought, at some time or other, a battle, which the plunderer well believes to have been a battle for right. For my father, the question between this kind of cowardice and the courage of faith, was an incomparably more serious one than that of any intellectual opinions whatever. It was therefore a particular delight to him, that he owed his election, or at least the fact of his being elected at once, upon the first scrutiny, to a man who differed very widely from him on many subjects and voted simply on grounds of general equity. The next letter to Mr. Kingsley will show that Mr. Selwyn made no secret of his vote.

'2 Brunswick Place, York Terrace, October 31, 1866.

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'I passed yesterday at Cambridge. I was grieved not to see my godson, but I went twice to look for him in Jesus Lane, and I should have gone again if I had not been much hurried. The meeting at the re-opening of the University was really cheering; so much hearty sympathy was shown by the tutors and old professors with the younger men. In my day there would have been nothing like it; so that I do hope there is good working in the midst of all that may well make us anxious. The thought of working there is an immense delight to me, as the thought of owing my appointment mainly to your zeal and suggestion has been. By-the-bye, I should have kept your secret most faithfully about Selwyn if he had kept it himself. But besides having me to dinner and telling me that he had voted for me, he announced it to the meeting at the Union Rooms yesterday, saying that he had had great pleasure in contributing to bring me there. Clark was astonished, but said that he was so brave and true a man that if he had done a thing which he thought right he would never shrink from confessing it.'

To Mr. Erskine, of Linlathen.

‘October 31, 1866.

No words of congratulation can give me so much comfort and help as yours, because I know you would only wish such work for me in the confidence that I might do something for the young men, who may listen to me, and for the University in which they are learning. I do feel it a very great and strange call to work, in the days that remain to me, for the class of men with whom I have really had most to do, and in whom I have been most interested always. The temptations to vanity and indolence in such a position are, I know, great; but I hope a better spirit than mine will give me the fire to burn up the chaff that is in me, and to kindle other hearts.’

To a Son who had a great admiration for Mazzini, on a report of Mazzini's death, which afterwards proved to be untrue.

‘MY DEAREST E.,

‘Cambridge, Saturday, 1866.

‘You have a right to ask for my sympathy. I should be very cruel if I withheld it from you. I think Mazzini has done a very noble work for his country, and that his watchword “God and the people” is one which all nations must be the better for; one which is the truest possible testimony against the intellectual liberalism which seems equally to abhor God and the people. What you have learnt from him you would be very wrong not to lay up in your heart and to be thankful for. Such treasures are worth much more than silver and gold. All of us should, after sixty years, think the least response to the words we have spoken is a thing to be welcomed, not expected; that it is good to feel how little we can do, and to desire that we may do that little. The Good is to conquer, if αἴλιον αἴλιον is to go before it.’*

* The reference is to the burden of the first chorus in the ‘Agamemnon,’ thus translated by the Dean of Wells:

“Wail as for Linos, wail, wail bitterly,
And yet may good prevail!”

to which he adds this note—

It was inevitable that my father's settling down at Cambridge should oblige him to bring to an end much of his London work. It would be impossible for him to continue his constant attendances in the evening at the Working Men's College. He remained principal. It was a consequence of this drawing to an end of his work that, in preparing the report for the year on the College, he looked back to the time of its first start, and gave an account of its origin and history. Of his views as so expressed the next letter will give in his own words a brief statement.

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

' November 7, 1866.

'The words in my report expressed accurately, so far as I am able to recover it, the feeling with which I regarded our work sixteen years ago; they certainly express the feeling with which I regard that work now. I never have repented, and hope that I never shall repent, of having been united with you in maintaining that Co-operation as applied to Trade has a Christian foundation. The phrase, Christian Socialism, I still think was a desirable defiance of two kinds of popular prejudice, and was worth all the obloquy and ridicule which it incurred. But the more I compared our proceedings in London with those of the men who were working unhelped in Rochdale and elsewhere in the North, the more I was convinced that we should mar the cause grievously and weaken any moral influence which we might possess, by continuing to meddle with the commercial part of the business; that doing little, and that little badly, we should become the victims of clever sharpers like Lechevalier, and should bring disgrace upon a principle which we felt to be sound. I was nearly sure also, from many symptoms, that we should fall out among ourselves, and should be, in a moral sense, anything but co-operators. As I was fortunate enough to find another way of bringing myself into discredit with the religious world, more effective than the use of the title Christian Socialist, which was beginning to be tolerated, I was the more free to consider, whether there was not another opening for the assertion of the principle of Co-operation, and whether it was not our special calling to avail ourselves of that opening. A college expressed to my mind, as I have said in the report, precisely the work that we could undertake, and ought to undertake, as professional men; we might bungle in this also; but there seemed to me a manifestly Divine direction towards it in all our previous studies and pursuits. And so far as we could give a hint of the way in which the professional and working classes might co-operate, so far I believed we should help to heal one of the great sores in the commonwealth, counteract the exclusiveness of literary men, undermine the notion that the patronage of rank or wealth is that which is wanted to elevate the labourer.'

"The song of Linos a type of life prematurely closed and bright hopes never to be fulfilled—had come to be the representative of all songs of mourning."

On Saturday, December 8th, the Working Men's College gave him an entertainment to congratulate him on his appointment to Cambridge. It was a remarkable gathering. Many of the speeches touched him much. Mr. Brewer, of King's College, made a very striking speech, giving the history of his long friendship with my father. Mr. Hughes made a characteristically generous one, saying that he had gradually come to expect that, in any matter in which he differed from my father, even if it was about the way of making a pair of boots,* he would be sure afterwards to discover that he had been wrong and my father right. Several of the working men spoke. One in particular said that there was one thing at least which they had all understood and keenly felt—his coming to them night after night at his age and with his reputation, through all

* The allusion was to an episode in the management of the Bootmakers' Association, as to which my father had held an opinion, which had not been adopted; the result of the action taken in that case had proved disastrous.

weathers, regularly during the twelve years. But the speech which touched him most was one in the course of which Mr. Ludlow, following Mr. Hughes, said, "Without in the least admitting or thinking that on the many points, in which I have often differed from Mr. Maurice, I must have been wrong or he right, I yet, as a proof of the reverence which from long and intimate experience of his life I have acquired of him, who, as I never knew a father, is the only man for whom I have ever felt a sense of reverence, wish here and now to ask his pardon for any words or acts of mine which have given him pain, and to offer him the apologies of a man not much wont to bend the knee to any human authority."

To Mr. J. M. Ludlow.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

December 10, 1866.

'I have no words to tell you, as you must very well know what I felt about your loving and generous speech on Saturday. It was far more than I could well bear to hear all that was said about me by others; but yours was quite overpowering. I will only thank you for it.'

To Mr. T. Erskine, of Linlathen, on hearing of Mr. Erskine's sister's death.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

London, December, 1866.

'You know all I would say to you so much better than I know it. But God knows better than you have done, and will teach you and sustain you in ways that we cannot dream of. What can one say but that He is the comforter?

'The thought of your sister comes back to me as of one of the most genial and sympathising persons I have ever met with. Surely her sympathies are not less, but are expanding, and will expand ever more and more. And you surely will have the blessing of them still, and she will share in yours. For I think their joy must be increased by that which comes to them from us consciously, while our blessing may come through them, when we do not know it. May all Divine and all human sympathy (are they not all one in Him who is perfectly divine and human?) be with you ever.'

On Tuesday, December 4th, 1866, he delivered his inaugural lecture in the Senate House, at Cambridge. The next letter refers to this lecture, which begins by discussing the full title of the chair given it by Dr. Whewell. It was called by Dr. Whewell the Professorship of "Casuistry, Moral Theology, and Moral Philosophy."

To Rev. C. Kingsley.

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY, 'The Athenæum, December 17, 1866.

'Your kind words are very cheering to me. The object of my lecture was to define my own position and to connect it with the wants of the students, not with any grand scheme of my own. I was most grateful to Whewell for the names by which he designated the chair, though they are somewhat magniloquent. It seems to me that casuistry rightly treated may be the proper counteraction, for young men at least, of Pusey's 'Confessional,' which is to me very terrible, and yet, I believe, the natural outcome of that indolent scorn which you so rightly deplore.

✓ 'The Saturday Review tone, however little in accordance with the ritualistic and ecclesiastical tone, is producing it in a great number of our weary and discontented ladies and gentlemen. On the whole it seems to me that the Protestant battle may be best fought among young men.

'At least I have felt so young, and so old, since I acquired the office which I owe mainly to you, that I cannot tell you what a strange impression I have of its being a call to the very work for which I was destined in my infancy and have been for sixty years preparing. To have your co-operation in it will be the greatest delight I can imagine. And I shall be most thankful on all accounts if you should see your way to execute your purpose of residing more in Cambridge. I shall be very sorry to lose Clark next term: his kindness and geniality and culture I have learned to prize greatly. Thompson and his wife are both very pleasant to me, and I cannot say how I rejoice in Selwyn's recovery. He received me with the utmost cordiality and generosity.

'My lecture is chiefly good for what it does not say. The wisdom of my wife led me to omit some allusions to the Comtists which I see now would have been much out of place; though of course the whole idea of recognising theology as the permanent ground, and the consummation of thought and life in this day, is anti-Comtian. I wished to have hinted that their own demand for a higher international morality made it necessary. But I should not have been understood, and my great object was to avoid anything which was likely to be misunderstood.'

My father's appointment to the Cambridge chair did not prevent his continuing to preach at Vere Street, as there was no parish work connected with the chapel. He resolved that after he had settled at Cambridge he would come up each Sunday to London. Usually from the beginning of the next term he slept at a friend's house on the Saturday night and returned to Cambridge on the Monday morning or Sunday night. From this time, however, there began a marked falling off in the numbers of the Vere Street congregation, which had never entirely recovered the shock of his supposed intention to resign "from conscientious scruples:" so difficult is it to uproot a misunderstanding that has once obtained a start. The journeys to and fro told on him severely; he was from the first scarcely fit for the double work, so that bright and sunny as were his remaining days, yet, from the time that he entered on his work at Cambridge, there was something of an autumn air about them, and from this time onwards it is of the last period of an almost spent life that one must speak. His successive courses of lectures at Cambridge represented the most complete working out of his own philosophical thought. The course of the first year was on the "Conscience" and was afterwards published under that name. Towards the end of the year he published a series of sermons preached in the University pulpit on "Hope." His letters mark I think the change that was passing over him. They are much less full of the busy work of life, and a certain mellowness, almost softness of tone, pervades them.

His hair was now of a silvery white, very ample in quantity, fine and soft as silk. The rush of his start for a walk had gone. His movements had like his life become quiet and measured. At no time had there been so much beauty about his face and figure. There was now—partly from manner, partly from face, partly from a character that seemed expressed in all—beauty which seemed to shine round him, and was very commonly observed by those among whom he was. It made undergraduates, not specially impressionable, stop and watch him. Some of them who had known nothing of him before he went up to the University, used to say they felt the better all day for seeing him pass. Servants and poor people whom he visited often spoke of him as "beautiful."

I do not know that the type and nature of this "beauty," the common, almost instinctive phrase used about him at this time, is anywhere better explained than in these words of Mr. Kingsley's: "The most beautiful human soul, whom God has ever, in His great mercy, allowed me, most unworthy, to meet with upon this earth; the man who, of all men whom I have seen, approached nearest to my conception of St. John, the Apostle of Love. Well do I remember, when we were looking together at Leonardo da Vinci's fresco of the Last Supper, his complaining, almost with indignation, of the girlish and sentimental face, which the painter, like too many Italians, had given to St. John. I asked why? And he answered . . . 'Why? Was not St. John the Apostle of Love? Then in such a world of hate and misery as this, do you not think he had more furrows in his cheeks than all the other apostles?' And I looked upon the furrows in that most delicate and yet most noble face, and knew that he spoke truth—of St. John and of himself likewise; and understood better from that moment what was meant by bearing the sorrows and carrying the infirmities of men."

+ 'A spiritual splendour' has been

For some years past he had been considering in what way he could take advantage of the fact that there was no parish work directly connected with the Vere Street Chapel, to utilise the services of those of the congregation, who had time to give, for some work of general service to the neighbourhood. Finally the opening of the "Girls' Home" was agreed upon, its purpose being thus explained by him: "Every congregation which meets to worship God and to join in Communion, seems pledged to do something for the neighbourhood in which it is placed. The members of the Church of St. Peter's, Vere Street, are better able than many to give this help; but no district is connected with the church, and those who frequent it have been obliged to seek for work elsewhere.

"It is suggested that they might unite in establishing an Industrial School for girls not convicted of crime, but liable to fall into vagrant and evil courses. Such a school need not be supported only by their contributions; they could ask pecuniary assistance, as well as counsel, from any friends: but it might be felt as a common bond of interest and fellowship to those who kneel together. Such a school need not withdraw pupils from any other; it might be opened first to a few girls, and might expand as space and income permitted. An Industrial School seems to meet the wants of the day better than any other. There is a demand for girls who can do household work. There is a complaint that at ordinary schools they acquire only an imperfect knowledge of books. Where lessons in the business of the housemaid, the parlour-maid, and the cook, and in all kinds of plain needlework, are combined with lessons in reading, writing, arithmetic, singing, and in the Scriptures, the last are more prized and better remembered, and the school becomes a better preparation for life."

To a young Lady.

'MY DEAR——,

'London, May 4, 1867.

'I do not think we can exaggerate the blessing that it would be to you and me and all of us, if we simply accepted the sacrifice of Christ and lived upon it. Therein all the love of God towards mankind, it seems to me, is expressed; a love infinite and immeasurable, going beneath all that we can ask or think. What I lament in Evangelical teaching generally, is a want of fullness on that subject, a disposition (against their own higher inspirations) to make the sacrifice conditional upon our understanding of it, when the comfort of it is that it entirely passes our understandings, that we must receive it with our spirits as we receive the bread and wine into our bodies, not knowing how it works, not trying to reduce it under our partial rules and maxims, only yielding ourselves to the power of it, only asking that in the strength of it we may offer ourselves sacrifices to God. . . . You may trace God's education in every event and circumstance of your life, in every trial and every joy. . . .

✓ Any teaching must be wrong if it draws you from trust in the love of God as reconciled in Christ, from the belief that in him you are reconciled to God, and that through Him He promises to renew His Spirit in you day by day. No discipline is sent to frighten us from God, but to draw us to Him—I am certain of that. On other points I feel as much a child as you can; as little able to form a system about the Sacrifice or about our faith. I cling to my catechism. I think that my Christian name tells me that I am a member of Christ, and a child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of Heaven. I know that the devil is always at work with me to persuade me to renounce God, and that I yield to him very often. But I believe I have a right to renounce the devil, to say that he is not my master and that Christ is: and that you, my dear child, may do also. Our enemies are the same and our Deliverer is the same. Trust in the Deliverer when your despair is greatest, and so overcome your enemies. You will overcome them far better than I do if you have less confidence than I have, if you remark your own weakness and proneness to fall more habitually.

‘I hope you will have no confidence in me further than as I lead you to have confidence in Him who gave His Son for us all. We ought to decrease every day in our estimation and in the estimation of our hearers that He may increase.

‘Never mind defending me if any one should tell you I have very bad opinions. It is possible I have. May God rid me of them! But if Christ makes you see anything that you did not see before, do not let that go. He gives you sight that you may see Him. God bless you.’

To a Son.

‘MY DEAREST E.,

‘Bredwardine, August 24, 1867.

‘... I am glad you have seen Gladstone and have been able to judge a little of what his face indicates. It is a very expressive one; hard-worked as you say, and not perhaps specially happy; more indicative of struggle than of victory, though not without promise of that. I admire him for his patient attention to details, and for the pains which he takes to secure himself from being absorbed in them by entering into large and generous studies. He has preserved the type which I can remember that he bore at the University thirty-six years ago, though it has undergone curious developments.’

To a Son.

‘Hamilton Villa, Weston-super-Mare, September 25, 1867.

‘MY DEAREST E.,

‘... I meant in speaking of Goldwin Smith’s democracy to indicate my respect for it so far as it is positive, however strong; my dissent from it only so far as it is negative, and, as such, I think weak.

‘Your democracy, as you state it, however couched in a negative form, is essentially positive. You regard it as an assertion of the supremacy of law over all individual men of all classes. Law being universal, you say is hostile to all privileges; that is, to all exceptions of men from the authority and operation of law. I certainly assent to that proposition. I maintain that law rides over kings and nobles just as much as over the meanest of the people. I believe that to be the principle of our Constitution. I do not know how there can be a Constitution of which it is not the principle. The maxim that the king can do no wrong implies nothing hostile to that doctrine. A long course of historical trials determined that it did not. It never affirmed the law to proceed from the mind of the king, but affirmed that the king, being the person who represented and embodied the law, could not be treated as if there were some power in the State superior to him; i.e. to the law. I do not care much for the phrase, but in that sense it is important and was acknowledged more distinctly than ever before, by Pym, Coke, Eliot, when they were asserting the dignity, permanence, sanctity of law against invasions of prerogative. They adhered carefully to the doctrine that the advisers of the king were to be held responsible for his wrong acts, precisely that they might preserve his position as that of the witness for law from generation to generation. The champions of the Court tried again and again to efface this distinction; the patriots maintained it.

‘When you denounce an aristocracy which rests upon privileges or exceptions from law, you again do good service. It was this notion that an aristocracy is one of privilege, that it is exempt from law, which overthrew the nobility of France. For the function of an aristocracy is in principle and has been practically in many periods, especially of English history, to maintain the existence of law and order against the efforts of the sovereign to set up a power independent of law; against the efforts of any mob to set up a power independent of law. When you say that a democracy, as such, is specially the champion of law, I think you scarcely do justice to its position, either now or in past times. Democracy expresses the worth of each single man. It counteracts the monarchical and aristocratical tendency to set up either certain persons’ authority or any formulas and decrees against living beings who form the nation; it has done this service and is doing it; but it is the service rather of resisting the summum jus which may become injuria than of vindicating it. The Democrat, as you see from the name and position of parties in America, must become the Republican (the assertor of a policy) before he can really be an upholder of Constitutional law, or of law in its most extended sense as the protector of each man's personal liberty. The mere democrat will be (if we may judge from that crucial instance) the defender of self-willed power—I should never put that dishonour upon him; non meus hic sermo; it is from the United States and its truest of men that one derives the lesson—sed hactenus hæc. I have told you what I meant and you can think it over. . . .’

To Miss Bell.

‘Hamilton Villa, Weston-super-Mare, September 26, 1867.

‘It is so long since I read my ‘Theological Essays’ or ‘The Doctrines of Sacrifice’ that I cannot tell how far I made an effort to express the principle which is the prominent one in the Epistle to the Hebrews, that Christ when He had by Himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of God, and is the High Priest of Humanity. If I did try feebly to utter that truth the only good I did was, as you say, to lead my readers to the book in which it is fully developed. Without it the most vehement assertion that Christ died for all, and that there is a salvation for all, will, I am convinced, be of very little avail to deliver the conscience from those agonising doubts of which you speak; doubts which recur again and again to us all, reminding us that no theory, no statement of truth, nothing but the Truth itself, can set them at rest.

‘To your first question, “Shall we be happy after death?” I should reply, “I do not know, I do not care to know, I do not think it is possible to know.” The Bible does not ascribe happiness to Christ when He was upon earth. Yet it says that He is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever; Christ says, “He who hath seen Me hath seen the Father.” It is written, “When He appears we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is." It is written also that "for the joy that was set before Him, He endured the cross, despising the shame." This "joy," joy in effecting His Father's purpose, joy in delivering men out of bondage, joy in beholding the fulness of His Father's love, I can ascribe to Him; this I can suppose Him to have had before the world was, to have had on earth, to have now. It was not incompatible in Him with deep sorrow; it rose out of sorrow. If men are to be like Him, they may enter into His joy; if they want some other joy I do not suppose they can have it, for I do not suppose there is any other.

“When you say, that there is no condemnation to those, who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit, but that most of us, you yourself among the rest, do very often walk not after the Spirit but after the flesh, you affirm what is most true, and you justify the Apostle in doing so; for you feel as if something were condemning you when you walk thus. But what is it to walk after the flesh? It is to walk as if we were separate from Christ, when we are not separate from Him, when we are united to Him. It is to set up a self apart from Him, apart from our fellows, when He has claimed us as one with Him, as one with our fellows. Here is, no doubt, the great contradiction. Only let us remember that it is a contradiction, the contradiction of a fact. Evil is not our state; good is our state; that for which God has created and redeemed us; evil is the denial of that state. I believe the Epistle to the Hebrews is repeating that assertion in every page and line, and attributing to the loss of faith in it the apostasy which the writer saw coming upon the Christians to whom he wrote. When I say faith in the assertion I use conventional language. The Epistle speaks of faith in the ascended Head of the race, in the Conqueror of Death, who had claimed for men their true position as sons of God in Him. When you say "the conscience of my sins must be greater the nearer I am brought to Christ," you say what is undoubtedly true, if the light which is in Christ were merely something brought to us and we stood aloof from it, wrapped in our own darkness. It is false if, as the Apostles say, "We are in Him;" if, as they say, "We may walk in the light as He is in the light!" Then the conscience of sins is dead and buried because we enter into His life, because we give up ourselves.

The last of the Apostles, the great Theologian, says that we never do this thoroughly, that if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. But the confession of sins, the acknowledgment of not having walked in the light as He is in the light, the acknowledgment of having gone out of our true state, brings us into the light, restores us to our true state. And then the blood of Jesus Christ, the true life-blood of humanity, cleanses us from our sins, delivers the conscience from the selfishness which is its curse and torment.

I do not think the word "then" in the passage from the Epistle to the Thessalonians of which I spoke, affects my interpretation of it. If the Thessalonians had said to themselves, "We that have remained till the appearing of Christ in the flesh have indeed a great blessing, but what has become of those who died before His appearing?" St. Paul might answer, "We shall not go before them, we shall not have any advantage of them. When Christ is manifested and every eye sees Him, they will rise to meet Him, for His power is over the whole universe; we that belong to this age shall follow, not precede them."

There may be difficulty in the words which I have not at all cleared away; but that on the whole appears to me nearer the sense than any exposition which assumes St. Paul to know where he or the Thessalonians should be at some distant period of the world's history.

I am not sure that I understand the passage in St. Matthew about the bodies of the saints appearing after the resurrection. I should not be disposed to build any inferences upon it, but I am sure it cannot set aside the words of our Lord, which spoke of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob as living not dead, or the evidence of the transfiguration.'

To Mr. T. Erskine, of Linlathen.

‘Hamilton Villa, Weston-super-Mare, September 26, 1867

‘Our good friend the Bishop of Argyll has written to me, to say how much he should like to tell my congregation some of the truth, which he has learnt from God’s Spirit through you, and I have written to say how much I should desire that he would, and that I might be one of the congregation. I do feel very often when I am trying to tell the young men at Cambridge of the conscience that is in each of them, and who is speaking to it, how much you have taught me about that, and how I should like to share my thoughts upon it with you. I think I have dwelt too exclusively on the social aspect of truth. I have been so much startled at some prevalent denials, especially by Bain, of individual responsibilities and freedom, that I have gone to that and made it the starting-point of my moral instructions. At the same time I know you will, more than ever, recognise with me the permanence and divinity of all human relations. God, it seems to me, has made and does make his revelation to us specially through them, though I own, with dear Scott, the great if the subordinate worth of the revelation through the outer world of nature. I have been staying by the sea with my dearest wife, who has been a great sufferer for the last two years. She was recovering, but has rather fallen back during the last week. She has shown me a little of the meaning of the words which curiously link the Apostle to Æschylus, ἔμαθεν ἀφ’ ὧν ἔπαθεν.*

‘I know, dear friend, how you have been learning in the same

* “He learned by the things which he suffered.” The reference to Æschylus is to a chorus in the ‘Agamemnon.’

“δίκαια δὲ τοῖς μὲν παθοῦσι μαθεῖν ἐπιρρέπει τὸ μέλλον.”

‘Agamemnon,’ 242.

“Justice turns the scale

For those to whom through pain,

At last comes wisdom’s gain.”

Dean of Wells’ Translation.

school. May all the sweetness of the discoveries come to you with the bitterness of the pain that leads to them. Many will be better for them hereafter. My wife joins with me in most affectionate remembrances to you.'

To Mr. J. N. Langley.

'Hamilton Villa, Weston-super-Mare, October 4, 1867.

'I have read with much interest in the Daily News a report of your speech on the means of attracting dissenters to the Church.

'I think nothing but good can come from the announcement of such sentiments, though I less and less see how it is possible to give them effect by any outward legislation, and though I feel that any suggestions which I could offer on the subject might only increase the confusion which we desire to abate.

'You may be quite right that the Athanasian Creed does not express the belief or conviction of most of those who use it, and that it is far better for such not to trifle with words so awful. But I wish that before it is given up, people would make themselves masters of the sense of some of its more common and least disputed expressions. A friend remarked to me this autumn that an immense majority of laymen, and he thought of clergymen also, supposed the "will," which is the translation of "vult," to be a future tense. What a difference does this make in the whole construction of the document! "Whosoever wishes or likes to be saved," from what? Assuredly from that which is damning him—from his pride, lust, habit of judging his neighbours, Pharisaism, falsehood, from all that is unlike the image of God revealed in Christ. Do you who come to church wish to be saved from these curses which most assuredly are destroying you and will destroy you, let your profession be what it may; then hold the Catholic faith which you say that you hold. Believe in the Name into which you are baptized, the Name in which you and all men are living and moving and having your being. Believe in the Infinite Charity which is surrounding and seeking to possess you and penetrate you. Be sure that outside of that Charity is no salvation for Papist or Protestant, Tractarian or Unitarian. Be assured that so far as you say that this Charity is not compassing the universe, not seeking to bring all into its circle, so far you contract the Catholic faith; so far you deny the Trinity. "Oh, but that is such a strange, unusual interpretation." Of course it is strange and unusual to give salvation an actual force, not to take it as a mere conventional phrase meaning nothing. Give it its force and must it not be all this and much more than this? And if it is taken to be all this the Creed will become exceedingly disagreeable, not to those who have attacked it, but to those who have defended it. For the truth is, we do wish or like to damn, and we wish or like to think of God as a God of damnation, whereas whoever wishes or likes to be saved must believe in a God of Salvation; that is the Name by which the Scriptures declare Him to us, that is the Name which Christ has revealed.

'I saw in a Sunday newspaper the other day that Lord Westbury and I do not believe in a hell. I cannot answer for Lord Westbury as I have not the honour of his acquaintance. I can only say for myself that the infinite horror of hell and its nearness to us discover themselves more to me the more I know of myself, the more I see of the Church and of the world. It is from this hell that I fly to the Father in Heaven, believing that out of it He seeks to deliver us, and that it consists in whatever is contrary to His nature and will.'

I ought, before closing this chapter, to refer more directly to the warm kindliness and appreciation with which my father was received at Cambridge, and to his keen enjoyment of the sympathy so shown him. His lectures were attended almost as largely by ladies as by men.

CHAPTER XIX.

"For, indeed, I am contending for that which I believe is the faith of all simple and childlike people; I am trying, in blundering language, to utter that which they embody in homely honest phrases of the heart. I know inwardly, and God knows, how gladly I would learn of them and be as they are; but if that may not be, or may only be granted hereafter as a reward of fighting with the temptations of a confused world and an evil heart, I will at least strive that they shall not be robbed of that which is most dear to them by a philosophical jargon—which as it seems to me is most unphilosophical."—F. D. M., 'Epistle to the Hebrews.'

THE PAN-ANGLICAN CONFERENCE—CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE BISHOP OF ARGYLL—THE PRAYER-BOOK—THE CATHOLIC FAITH—FAITH—THE TRUSTER—DIFFERENCE AND INDIFFERENCE—LECTURES ON NATIONAL MORALITY—RELATION OF THE CONSCIENCE TO REVELATION AND TO MAN—THE "I" v. PSYCHOLOGY—TO THE FATHER OF A YOUNG MAN ABOUT TO JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME.

THE "Pan-Anglican" Conference of Bishops had assembled at Lambeth. Of all the bishops present at it, there can be no doubt that the Bishop of Argyll had most my father's sympathies.

The Bishop has described with admirable clearness* the nature of certain intrigues, to which it has been necessary to allude already, to which he strongly opposed himself as they took their most unmistakeable form at that meeting. My father, disliking these as much as the Bishop, was very anxious nevertheless that there should be no excuse given by any action of the Bishop of Argyll for what might become a schism.

* In "The Lambeth Encyclical." See also the 'Memoir of Bishop Ewing,' chap. xxviii.

The Bishop especially dreaded one phrase that had been used in the document that was finally put forth as the encyclical letter of the Conference. It spoke of Christ as "reconciling the Father to us." It seemed to him at first in conflict with the words "reconciling the world unto Himself." My father had always regarded the first words (used in the 2nd Article) as obviously gaining their force from St. Paul's words, and therefore as in nowise implying what he as much as the Bishop disliked in the so-called "popular" religious phrases of the day—the assumption that Christ's death had made some change in the mind or temper or purposes of the immutable God. It is on this point that the next letter turns.*

‘Hamilton Villa, Weston-super-Mare, October 6, 1867.

‘MY DEAR BISHOP,

I have thought earnestly about the subject of your letter, and I will try to tell you why I am very thankful that you did not refuse to sign the Pastoral Letter, on the grounds which you mention, and why I hope and trust that you will not make the second article a reason for separating from the English Church.

‘I confess that I was not struck by the sentence or clause of the letter to which you refer. I read it over twice without even noticing that there was such a one. I was struck and pained by the omission in such a document of any allusion to the Living Word; by the want of any recognition of the principle which the Theologian regarded as the ground of His theology, while there was so laborious a statement respecting the claim of the scriptures to a title which they so rarely claim for themselves. But you were right, I think, in not protesting against language which, interpreted by the articles and the history of the Reformation, means an assertion of the Lex-Scripta in opposition to oral traditions and ecclesiastical decrees; and (interpreted by the same articles and the same history) cannot be intended to disparage or ignore Him who is One with the Father and the Light of Men.

* The Spectator had complained of the Bishop's having signed the Encyclical Pastoral because of this very phrase "reconciling the Father to us." See 'Memoir,' p. 478.

And here comes in the other point. There is no assertion, in all our dogmatic formularies, of the Living Word, as the root of all life and good to men, so distinct as that which is contained in the second article. I have always turned to that Article, occurring where it does, as the great witness for a theology constructed not like that of Knox or the Westminster Assembly, on the basis of the Fall, but on the basis of Redemption; or rather on the original constitution of men in the Only-Begotten Son by which the Redemption itself must be interpreted. If any one separates the words "reconciled the Father to us" from the context of the article and grafts them on another scheme of Divinity,—one which supposes Christ to have suffered and been crucified, to have died and been buried, that He might persuade the Father not to punish men, or a certain portion of men, for their original guilt or their actual sins—he simply changes the whole meaning of the language to which we have subscribed; he ought to recall his subscription; there is the most utter and entire avoidance of that vile notion in this Article and in every one which succeeds it. Christ has died and been buried to take away sin, not to exempt any from the punishment of sin. And what is sin? Separation from God, a breach between the creature and Him in whose image he is made, a division between the child and the Father. In this sense (which is the sense of the article) it is as true that Christ reconciles the Father to us as that He reconciles us to the Father. In His own person He destroys the barrier between us and Him, and till that is removed there can be no Atonement; the Father may seek reconciliation with us but He is not reconciled to us. I wish you would seriously consider the article in this light—not only dismissing the other notion, but regarding the article as the most effectual protest against it—and then I think you will see that you not only have gained much by inducing the bishops to refer you to this article as the explanation and justification of their phraseology; but that the article fills up that omission in the pastoral of which I complain. Let the Bishop of Oxford speak of that as much as he likes; it will be the best correction of his grand rhetoric, which because it is rhetoric must fly to pictures of punishment instead of proclaiming a Gospel of deliverance from sin. I think there was a time with him, I know there was with the Archbishop of Dublin, when a promise of deliverance from sin looked a far higher message than the greatest assurance of escape from punishment. I know nothing of what either is thinking now, but I hope there are moments when they still walk in the light of an earlier faith. For their sakes as much as for your own, I do trust, my dear Bishop, that nothing will deprive us of your fellowship. I believe you may be a most important and blessed witness to all the Anglican bishops of that true unity, in the Father and the Son, through the one Spirit, which we might have with all, who do not choose separation, because they would exalt their own notions or some ecclesiastical authority into the place of God.

‘P.S. If you should like to show this letter to the Bishop of London [Tait], I am quite willing that you should do so. Your ‘Fragments on Unity,’ which I had not read when I wrote this, illustrate, it seems to me, what I have said in it. They speak of harmony or unity with the Father, and sin being taken away that there may be this harmony. The mind of perfect goodness cannot be in harmony with the mind of a creature who has sinned (i.e. cannot be reconciled to that creature) unless the obstacle is taken away. Of course, He must take it away, and that is declared by the article, when it asserts with such vehemence and distinctness that the Son is of one substance with the Father; that His mind is the perfect expression of His Father’s mind. If the article is true, the notion of his bringing His Father by some act of His to change His will or purpose is heresy. I do not mean that one should take a step to hinder men who hold that heresy from possessing all offices and high places in the Church ; but I mean that we are clearly not bound to hold it ourselves, and may always and in all places assert the doctrine which it contradicts.'

To Miss Williams Wynn (on the death of a sister).

' 3 St. Peter's Terrace, Cambridge, December 6, 1867.

'MY VERY DEAR FRIEND,

'I have longed to write to you, but I have felt that I ought to choose some calm moment for doing it, lest I should trouble you with vain and foolish words, which are so trying in times of sorrow.

'What you said to Georgina just before you left us, is the truest of all words, I am sure, to remember and lay up in our hearts. It is not death we have to think of, nor of the separation which comes when the eyes are closed. No; it is Life, which we may recollect at all times is stronger than death, and has overcome it, and will overcome it altogether.

'Your sisterly bond has been so close and wonderful a one that you have a pledge of its eternity. And if that failed as a ground of consolation, God Himself is a surer pledge: His life is our life. That seems to me a more sustaining thought and hope than any which rests on our own immortality. God has revealed Himself to us, as the Eternal Righteousness, as the Eternal Life. In Him we have both, and there can be no limit to either. Christ must be drawing all things to Himself and to His Father.

'I believe that, more than in any former time, we must begin everything from God, and see everything terminating in Him; that our hope must be in Him.

'But the belief that He has entered into fellowship with us in the Mediator, that in Him God has reconciled us to Himself, and that through Him there is a way open for us into the presence of God, seems to me a greater help and strength for that very reason.

'The whole family in heaven and earth looks up to a Father, but through our elder Brother, and the Spirit in whom they are one is given us to make us one with them.

‘I have thought of this, because it strikes me that in seasons of great grief we especially require this assurance of a reconciliation, and a unity going beneath all that seems to rend us asunder.

‘I have been trying to speak to the young men here about hope. I feel the need of cultivating it, the more conscious I am of a perpetual inclination to despondency. May the God of hope impart it more and more to you, my dear friend.’

To the Bishop of Argyll.

‘St. Peter’s Terrace, Cambridge, December 10, 1867.

‘The assumption in most men’s minds is that the Prayer Book, as such, is exclusive, and that all passages like those your friend has quoted are splendid inconsistencies. I am thoroughly convinced that this is not so. I came to the Prayer Book out of a dissenting school, and it was the largeness and freedom of its declarations which struck me as the great escape from their narrowness and sectarianism, from the narrowness and sectarianism of those who, like the Unitarians, utterly severed God from His creatures, as much as from the pseudo-Calvinism which made Him the Saviour of the elect, the destroyer of mankind. I believe the Catholic Faith—the Faith in a Father who so loved the world as to give His Son for it—in a Son, who, because He is one with the Father, and came into the world to do the will of His Father, offered Himself freely as a sacrifice to redeem men from sin and to bind them to God—of a Spirit who proceeds from the Father and the Son to bind all kindreds of men into a Divine Unity—has been underlying Christendom, expressing itself in the Universal Baptism, in the Holy Communion, in prayers that carried men above all their notions and dogmas. I believe that this faith has been struggling against a huge mass of sacerdotal and popular opinions in every age, and that there is in our age a wonderful gathering of Romanist and Protestant dogmatists, of Spiritualists and Comtists, of Conservatives and of Democrats to overthrow it. One always suspects that every Synod in Rome or in London will aim some blow at it, will subvert it by its own decrees. At the same time out of Romanism and Protestantism, out of every form of philosophy, out of every political school, there are coming forth such witnesses of it as a real foundation upon which honest men can stand, though the earth should be removed and the mountains carried into the depths of the sea, as there never have been in any previous age, and as gather the testimonies of all previous ages into themselves. The substitution of Dogma for GOD which is the characteristic tendency of Pusey and his school as much as of Auguste Comte and his school, is surely leading to a fearful Atheism, or to a Devil-worship; but to an Atheism which will evolve a more distinct proclamation of the everlasting God than our fathers heard; to a Devil-worship which will force men to the belief of a God of absolute justice and love, a real Redecmer from the pit of darkness and despair. I feel this more intensely every day, and the more I feel it the more anxious I am that such as you should reserve yourselves for the conflict which must come soon, and should not put yourselves in any false position by acknowledging that you are not now in a true position. Theirs is the false position; the position which needs all new decrees, explanations, evasions, to sustain it. If the Pharisees ("the Party of Progress," according to the writer on the Talmud in the last 'Quarterly') cast any man, who is sure that Christ has opened his eyes, out of the synagogue, Christ I believe will meet with him, and reveal Himself to him more and more as the Son of God. That, I think, has been the case emphatically with our honoured friend, Mr. Campbell. But if we cast ourselves out of the synagogue, I fear lest false prophets and false Christs should meet with us and should draw us into their synagogue. I am sure you will have a mouth and wisdom given you to answer your Primus if he should ask you to abandon any truth on which you have found a footing, and I hope we shall have the same mouth and wisdom to answer our Primus if he should make similar demands on us. Till they are made, I believe our strength is, not to sit still, but to preach the gospel so far as we have learnt it, and to wait for more light.

‘I do not quite feel with you about the recent appointments in the English episcopacy. The men may be to a certain extent dogmatists: but they are, Bishop Selwyn especially, men with a vital strength, which I believe proceeds from the living God, and which will not be satisfied with anything less than the acknowledgment of Him.’

To Mr. T. Erskine, of Linlathen, to whom he had paid a visit soon after Christmas.

‘3 St. Peter’s Terrace, Cambridge, January 13, 1868.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘I do indeed look back with much wonder and thankfulness to the intercourse with you which inaugurated the beginning of this year for me. There is so much in the interchange of convictions even if one receives nothing fresh; but you gave me what was the quickening and renewal of thought and life, that had been in me doubtless, but that were not clearly or consciously in me, so that I felt you to be truly an instrument of the Spirit doing and fulfilling His work.

‘I have especially recurred to all that you said about Faith. It seems to me that all my teaching here ought to be affected by it. I cannot help perceiving that we have been trying to build social life and personal life upon distrust and suspicion of each other, and of God; and that the human ἦθος is, as you said, that of trust; the man, the Divine Man being the Truster Himself and the source of Trust in all the race. I quite feel with you that Christ’s trust in the Father is the sign and witness of His divine nature, that which corresponds and shows forth the righteousness of God, that which is the basis of righteousness for man. And I cannot doubt that in Him God justified the trust of every man, Jew and Gentile, since the foundation of the world, and pronounced sentence upon all the distrust and self-exaltation of every Jew and Gentile. All polities and societies grew up, I conceive, through the trust of men in each other and through trust in some one whom they could not see and could not name, but who, they felt, was not far from any one of them. And, as clearly and obviously, all polities and societies perished through distrust of the members in each other, and through distrust of their Father in Heaven; through the establishment of some dark power to be dreaded and hated, not trusted, in His place. The Revelation of the Father, by the Son, as well as of the Son by the Father, was in truth that which men in all different ways, in their social acts and theories as much as in what would be called their religious acts and theories, had been showing that they needed. Christ came, in the fulness of the time, to bring to light the mystery that had been about all ages and generations though hidden from all. And in all ages since, the trust of men in every work they have engaged in, as thinkers, discoverers, martyrs, has had no other root than that faith of Jesus Christ, that confidence of Him in His Father which sustained Him in life and death, and to which he appealed in every leper and blind and palsied man, as well as in every one whom he raised from the tomb. That I understood to be your meaning, and my conscience thoroughly responded to it. I wish I had read more of your book [on the Epistle to the Romans] and talked more about it with you. The part I read interested me deeply. And I think when you come to the 3rd chapter of which you speak, you will be able to show how much its sense has been perverted by the effort to make out a charge of universal depravity from it as the reason for the necessity of faith; whereas, if I read him right, he is teaching us that the Psalmist found among the Jews of his age—those Jews who were in the Covenant, and had every call to exercise faith—an utter want of it, and therefore great moral corruption. “What the law speaks it speaks to those who are under the law"—the Jew is proved to have no better standing ground in himself or in his national privileges than another man, that he and all might know that they have a standing ground in God's righteousness; that no trust in that can be wrong or can fail. "All are concluded under sin," are found to be sinners in themselves that they might be all righteous in God; that they might, Gentiles as well as Jews, believe that Christ had been manifested for their justification. Justification by faith is surely a most wholesome and complete doctrine when it means faith in a Justifier, in one who is righteous, and who makes righteous; but is it not a pestilent doctrine if it means that we are justified by faith in our difference from those who are not justified? That is the very faith which St. Paul is tearing to pieces as the essential unbelief.

'I am afraid I have tried your eyes too long; but I could not forbear to thank you for your most kind and loving note.'

To a Son.

'MY DEAREST E.,

'Cambridge, Saturday, 1868.

'... I dread, for all, indifference, not difference from me. God is guiding this age and the persons in it by ways that I know not. I believe and hope that those who are following us will be far more deep and earnest believers in Him than we have been, will be far more under the dominion of His Spirit of Truth. When they fancy they are throwing off a yoke, I think they are sometimes putting on a new yoke; but I don't the less believe that they are on their way to deliverance; that they will receive much [of] what we have lost as well as come into a land of promise that we can only see afar off. We may be of a little use while we remain here in giving some warnings, derived from the experience of our own blunders, but if we try to compel any merely to walk in our steps we show distrust and not faith—God has guided us in spite of our vanity and wilfulness, and He will guide you. Our guidance is good for very little except as it points to that ...'

To Miss Williams Wynn.

' 3 St. Peter's Terrace, Cambridge, February 17, 1868.

' MY DEAR FRIEND.

' Your very kind letter to Georgina of this morning must, I am grieved to say, be answered by another hand than hers. She has had threatenings of rheumatic gout for many days, and now she is fixed to her bed by sciatica. She sends you her dearest love, and begs me to tell you how fully she had intended to write to you all last week. She has been making herself unnecessarily anxious about me, merely because I have yielded to the doctor's wishes, and for a time given up duty in London. But I am, as she allows, and bids me tell you, very much better for the holiday, and quite equal to the modicum of work I have allowed myself here. I find that both lectures and sermons take more out of me than they did; but I think it is better they should. They are less of intellectual exercises, and more parts of my life, than they were in earlier days. Those lectures which I am now delivering on National Morality, seem to me more personal, more like confessions, than anything I ever wrote.

' I wish, my dear friend, you could have given me more cheering news about yourself, more cheering to us I mean, for you will find hidden springs of life which no one knows of but the heart to which they are opened.

' That the Kingdom of Heaven is within us, not through some effort of ours to believe in it, but because it has always been—when we knew it and dreamed of it least—I am more and more convinced. When our Lord said, "it is at hand," He surely meant this. He came that He might make us know where it is, and might turn us to it from all the things that have kept us from it, and yet have been illuminated by it. In one way or another, I fancy we are all taught, or to be taught this lesson. Pain, I doubt not, of which I have known nothing, is one of the great books out of which it is gathered; but different methods are chosen by the School-master. I cannot believe that He will fail with any at last;

if the work was in any other hands it might be wasted; but His will must surely be done, however long it may be resisted.'

To Miss Williams Wynn.

'11 Princes Street, Cavendish Square, March 4, 1868.

'MY DEAR FRIEND.

- 'I was more pleased than I can tell you by what you said of my Hope sermons. I knew you would think far too well of them, but yet the comfort of hearing that you had found any good in them was very great. In my inmost heart I am thankful for not having received all the flattery which my evil nature would have relished much; but the sympathy of dear friends is increasingly and intensely valuable to me. I wish I gave them as much proof of it, as I receive from them, The —s are exceedingly good, and fight hard, I am sure against the inclination to feed on their sorrows.
- 'You must know much of that struggle, dear friend, more than I can guess; and I am sure God's grace enables you to maintain it amidst all difficulties.
- 'You will have wondered, with the rest of the world, at the final fulfilment of all the 'Vivian Grey' prediction in Disraeli's premiership. It is a very curious, some will think a rather portentous, sign of the triumph of mere talent and determination to rise. What will be the fruit of it, as to measures, I suppose no one can conjecture. The ethical marvel is quite enough to ponder over.
- 'I meet with very few people who do not expect the Irish Establishment to fall; but how, and what is to replace it, as few seem able to predict. I expressed a conviction that it was doomed, in a recent number of the 'Contemporary.' The Dean of Cork, [Magee, at present (1883) Bishop of Peterborough] I hear, has answered, this month, with great ability and courtesy.
- 'I do hope you have had the enjoyment of a visit from Mrs. Gaskell. I suppose by this time she will have left you.'

To Mr. T. Erskine, of Linlathen.

‘ 20 Queen Anne Street, London, July 23, 1868.

‘ MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘ I have wished much that you should read some lectures which I have written, ‘ On the Conscience.’ They approach from the opposite side that great question which you approach in your Commentary on the Romans from the Divine side. The righteousness of God speaks, as I think and you think, in Christ directly to that in each man which God has created to recognise His voice. It seems to me that the conscience with its mysterious duplicity is the very self in each man ; that which is feeling after God if haply it may find him, that which, if it does not find him, must sink into selfishness and brutality and make gods after its own likeness. That is the state which I find described so wonderfully in the first chapter of the Epistle. All the rest of it developes, it seems to me, most clearly and delicately the twofold principle of the conscience till the crisis of its agony and of its deliverance is reached in the seventh chapter. I have not alluded to the Epistle in my lectures. Nor do I think that any commentary upon it ought to treat the conscience as St Paul’s primary subject. The manifestation of righteousness as you have set it forth, in connection with the Union of the Father and the Son, is undoubtedly that which has first to be exhibited. But I have been so much impressed with the truth of St. Paul’s statement when it is looked at as a lesson in moral and human philosophy, that I could not but speak of it to you. My endeavour has been to get rid of what is called psychology and to bring each of my students to say, ‘ The conscience is not a part of my soul, but is I myself. Parting with it, I lose not like Chamisso’s hero my shadow, but the substance from which my shadow is cast.’

To Miss Williams Wynn.

‘3 St. Peter’s Terrace, Cambridge, July 29, 1868.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘I have just returned from a week of excessive heat and noise in a London lodging, and I hope soon to take Georgina to the sea, whether on the east, north or Welsh coast we have not yet decided. I am glad, my dear friend, that you have been able to bear up under this atmosphere, which seems to have been nearly as oppressive in Switzerland as with us. I want to speak with you on many subjects which interest me deeply. I cannot say that I am very much interested in the shufflings of the political cards, but there are profound principles at the heart of our endless agitations which must work out mighty results. The most earnest unbelief of the day is surely a protest against the unbelief to which the Church has yielded. I am sometimes staggered with the Atheism which there is in oneself, and which seems as if it came out in our most religious words and acts. And then again I feel assured that there will be a manifestation of the spirit of Truth and Unity in conflict with the unclean spirits that contradict and divide, such as there has not been since the days of the Apostles. You will be struck and interested by an article by Westcott in the ‘Contemporary’ on the Christian aspects of Comtism. I have great sympathy with the feeling in which the article is written, but I am more anxious to assert how much the Comtist plea, for a more sound international morality than clergymen have advocated, necessitates the acknowledgment of such a Father of the whole Family as Christ revealed, of such a Redeemer and Centre of Humanity as He is. It seems to me that Englishmen are more likely to be led back into faith by the political road than by the German metaphysical road; though that may be suitable to some minds. I have been printing some lectures on the Conscience, which I should like to send you as soon as they are published. They express part of my convictions, and though they are very incomplete, it is a part which I have felt it specially needful to utter at this time. How I shall delight if we are allowed to meet again this winter !'

To a Friend whose mother was dying.

'3 Marine Terrace, Tenby, September 6, 1868.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

'I have just heard from —— of your deep and increasing anxiety about your mother. It is sad to think how little one can help at such times ; I often envy the physician who can at least suggest and soothe. But I must tell you that we have not forgotten you and all your kind sympathy with us in days of joy and sorrow. And the older one grows the more, I think, one understands the worth of that kind of communion which there is between a mother and a son ; how much other intercourse has grown out of that, and wants something which belongs to it. But it can never cease—I am sure of that, little as I may be, or ever deserve to be, conscious of any special communications from those whose hands I once pressed. The inward influences and illuminations which come to us through those who have loved us, are deeper than any that we can realise ; they penetrate all our life and assure us that there must be a fountain of Life and Love, from which they and we are continually receiving strength to bear and to hope.'

To the same Friend after his mother's death.

'3 Marine Terrace, Tenby, September 15, 1868.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

'Dr. Dyster showed me your note. The thought that the battle is over and the victory won does not make your desolation less. I can partly conceive from your letter and from what I know of you how great it must be. It is thus, I believe, we are taught who the Comforter is and what His might over our spirit is. I believe, my dear friend, there is much work for you still to do. I have felt at sixty-three as if mine might be just beginning. It may, for ought I can tell, be just ending here, and yet I am not mistaken in the other conviction. There has been a thought pursuing me ever since I was a child which I seem just, for the first time, to be apprehending. And is it not so with us all? Has not each one a vocation which God by degrees makes him aware of? Through strange ways He leads us, and there are certain crises in our lives when we know that He has been leading us, and, in some faint degree, whither we are bound. I am sure that the gifts which He has bestowed on you, and the earnestness to use them, will be more than ever brought forth and manifested through the sorrow which now overwhelms you.'

To One whose son was inclining to join the Church of Rome.

'3 Marine Terrace, Tenby, September 15, 1868.

- 'Your interesting letter only reached me last night, having travelled from London to Cambridge, where I am now living, and thence to this place where I am spending a few weeks for Mrs. Maurice's health. But for this cause you may be sure that I should not have delayed to thank you for your kind confidence in me, and to try—though with a deep sense of my inadequacy to treat those diseases of the spirit which I am encountering continually—if I could say anything which might help you or your son.
- 'His statement of the case for Protestantism and of that for Romanism shows that his mind is argumentative and logical, and (I should say) that he has read quite as much as is good for him in support of the Anti-Papal side. I am much more afraid of the effect which may be produced on any thoughtful and sceptical man by the defenders of the Protestant position than by its assailants. And this not because I have the least doubt that we have a firm and impregnable ground to stand upon, if we will claim it, but because we are so much inclined to rest upon negations, and to trust in the skill with which we can maintain them.

‘Your son thinks—Protestant and Romanist disputants alike teach him to think—that what he wants is some security for his opinions. “Can you obtain,” the Romanists say to him, “any tolerable certainty for right belief unless you have an infallible dictator as to what you should believe?” “Yes,” replies the opponent. “If I read the Scriptures and pray, I can get at least a fair probability of going right or not very wrong.” Now I would venture to ask, “Does either the Church suppose that it speaks orally, by St. Peter and his successors; or does the Bible set this problem before me?” One as little as the other. The Church preaches to me in its creeds a Gospel of a Son of God and a Son of Man, the Head and Lord of every man, in whom I may believe and trust, who is the Deliverer from death and the grave and hell, to whom I may commit my body and soul and spirit, who has come from the Father of the whole Family in Heaven and earth, who is with me for ever, who gives us His Spirit that He may make us members of His family, sharers of His nature. Is not that the “oral” teaching? If not, the Romanist is at issue with his own creeds. If he puts any person between us and the Son of God and the Son of Man, if he says that the Son of God and the Son of Man is not the Head of every man, and that He is not calling every man to trust in Him for life and death—he is at war, not with Protestantism, but with the message of St. Peter, and I presume of the successors of St. Peter if they call themselves Vicars or Ministers of Christ. On the other hand, if the Protestant puts the Bible between human beings and the Son of Man; if he bids any human being engage in a long train of Biblical study or comparison of arguments respecting texts of Scripture before he believes in Christ as his Prince and Deliverer, he sets at naught the Bible, he makes it a dead, nay, a killing letter.

‘To a man in the business and work of the world like your son, the message of an actual Lord and Friend and Helper is worth all the opinions that were ever held and all the debates that were ever debated by all the Protestants and Romanists in the world. And what a bond that faith is between them ! What need is there to decide if $\frac{4}{5}$'s are Romanists and $\frac{1}{5}$ Protestants ; if it be indeed true, as they both profess to hold, that Jew, Greek, Barbarian, Scythian, bond and free are all one in Christ ?

‘ Your son knows, doubtless, how people who disbelieve in Christianity are talking of Humanity, are making that an object of worship. He will find, I think, that the old faith of Romanists and Protestants in a Son of God, who has exhibited the perfect image of God in a perfect Humanity, is the satisfaction of these longings. Christ is now as He was before He came in the flesh the desire of nations. When Romanists and Protestants understand this, they will cease to wrangle about opinions. The first will feel that there is another and higher centre than any Latin Bishop to whom they may turn ; higher and yet how much nearer, how much more capable of understanding each one of us as well as of binding us all into one. The other will protest against the authority of the Latin Bishop, only because he hides Christ from those to whom He has united Himself, and therefore will be aware of his own tendency, to make the books of the Bible, or his notions about the Bible, into barriers of the same kind.

‘ Your son thinks that the mistakes and blunders into which we have fallen are reasons for doubting the promise of Christ that His Spirit shall guide us into all truth. I can say, after sixty-three years of mistakes and blunders, that I cling to that promise all the more confidently on account of them ; that I believe they have been instruments, in God’s hands, of giving me glimpses of the Truth, that I have the certainty that there is One who is absolute Truth. During the threescore years and ten of our earthly pilgrimage, we are just spelling out our primers. Through ages upon ages the divine lessons will be unfolding themselves. To own the height and depth, the length and breadth, of the love which is revealing itself in all God's works and ways, to trace it in a few of its manifestations towards human beings, is better work than to discuss any opinions. So best we learn what opinions have meant to those who have striven about them most earnestly.'

CHAPTER XX.

“No man in this world has a right to all his rights; that is the paradox which states our truth. It often seems as if the highest and profoundest truths could not be stated except in paradox. ‘If one is always claiming his rights,’ says a German writer, ‘the world is like a hell.’ . . . Only we must remember that the beauty of [surrender of right] is in its voluntariness, and that to make such relinquishment obligatory, either by statute law or social edict, is to rob it of its essential character.”—Phillips Brooks.

LETTERS TO THE ‘DAILY NEWS’ ON CHURCH AND STATE—VIEW OF THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN THEM—SPIRIT AND LAW—LIFE IN DEATH—ON GUIZOT’S ‘LIVES OF LOUIS XIX. AND CALVIN’—DEFINITIONS OF A SACRAMENT DESTRUCTIVE OF ITS ESSENCE—THE ASCENSION AS THE DESTRUCTION OF PRIESTCRAFT—ON THE DANGER OF COMPETITIVE EXAMINATIONS—RESIGNS, FROM ILL-HEALTH, ST. PETER’S, VERE STREET—THE GATHERING TO THE FINAL COMMUNION—USE OF “REVELATION” IN THE NEW TESTAMENT—FEMALE SUFFRAGE—DEAN STANLEY, F. D. M., AND THE BROAD-CHURCHMEN—MR. LESLIE STEPHEN’S ARTICLE BRINGS THE RELATIONS OF THESE TO AN ISSUE—F. D. M.’S RELATION TO SCIENCE AND SCIENTIFIC AGNOSTICISM.

In the course of September 1868 my father wrote a series of letters to the Daily News, eight in all, on the subject of “Church and State.” It was the period preparatory to the election of the new Parliament which was to decide on the fate of the Irish Church. The letters were occasioned by a notice in the Daily News of a sermon by the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol [Ellicott] in which notice the writer had spoken of the Erastian tenets (i.e. the belief in the claims of the State to select and determine all things in relation to religious matters) “which certain able divines and laymen in the English Church have adopted and are vigorously defending." Of these my father says, "Regarding with intense horror the ecclesiastical tyranny which may creep in—which is creeping in—upon us under the name of religious liberty, I regard also with extreme dislike the Erastian doctrines which are creating a reaction in favour of it. Believing a union of Church and State to be implied in the existence of each, and to be necessary for the protection of moral freedom, I see equal dangers in the disposition of Churchmen to make the Church into a powerful and domineering State, and of statesmen to make themselves dictators in the Church. History I think contains warnings as terrible against one as against the other assumption."

He then traces the history of Church and State in order to maintain that the notion of their separate existence and of their entering into a bargain with one another is an idle fable.

"What I mean," he says, "by the Union of Church and State is the co-operation of spirit with law; the abandonment of the attempt to put one for the other, or to dispense with either." Throughout the history he is studying the purpose of a God who "uses different and opposite instruments in the education of a land"—Becket and Henry II., More and Henry VIII. He shows that historically the "sacrilege" of which Henry VIII. was guilty was not the diversion from "religious" to "secular" uses of the property of the monks, seeing that not only is this distinction between religious and "secular" one which denies to God the greater part of His universe, but that the transcription of manuscripts of classical authors, etc., though some of the most valuable work done by the monks, can, under no method of division, be called "religious." He declares that the sacrilege—the sin against God—lay in the robbery by private nobles and their families of that which was devoted to the service of the nation. In the course of the letters he, on these principles, touches on the questions of the Irish Church, education, laws of property, and all the other points on which the several principles of law and spirit come into contact or apparent collision. Always the principle on which he bases his plea is "that the State is not what Churchmen and statesmen of different schools have declared it to be—a vulgar earthly institution, which might do the dirty work of the Church, paying its ministers, persecuting its foes, or determining its teachings, but a sacred and divine institution bearing a witness for law and justice which the Church under no condition has borne or can bear." Of the Church, on the other hand, he always speaks as "a human and divine polity" to which man as man belongs, which concerns the relation of his spirit to a universal and uniting Spirit. Each he believes to be necessary to the right action of the other. He maintains that all "sect" teaching is essentially secular, whether it be the teaching of the party arguments of Churchmen against dissenters, or of dissenters against Churchmen—the one thing that in such teaching disappears, being the principle "that children are spiritual creatures, growing up amidst spiritual foes, under a spiritual guidance," which is the principle of the Church Catechism, so that in teaching children, from Bible texts, glib proofs of barren religious formulæ, the clergy sin against light, whatever dissenters may do.

He maintains that while the State, as the assertor of law, ought always to be by its very nature conservative of property, careful of individual rights, the Church, on the other hand, is bound to be by its nature "communistic," bound to say to every man, "What you have is not your own. You are only trusted with it that you may do with it what it is right that you should do."* He believed that the Irish Church was an effort like that under the Stuarts to enforce Episcopacy upon Scotland; an effort of the State to impose a Church—therefore its two centuries had been a history of failure, and, as it had as a matter of fact failed to be a national Church, it must fall; to rise again renewed and invigorated by the change.

* It will be interesting to compare with this the letter to Mr. Ludlow on p. 8 of this vol., at the beginning of the Christian Socialist movement. The identity of thought is noteworthy.

To Dr. Dyster.

‘4 German Place, Brighton, January 18, 1869.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘A sister whom I lost at an earlier age than that to which your dear child’s stay on earth was prolonged, used to dwell with especial fervour on the words—“I came that they might have life, and have it more abundantly.” It always seemed to me when I was looking on Miss Hennell’s face as if that promise had been fulfilled to her here, and would be fulfilled to her when she was seen no more. Her face expressed such richness of life, and gave such a pledge that the life must be poured into her more abundantly. Of every Christian death-bed the poet’s sentence must be true: “Death itself there dies”; but there are some in which it is more manifestly, palpably true.

‘The loss of the look and the voice is nevertheless greater to those who have been continually receiving the blessing of both, than any one can measure; no memory or hope, I imagine, can abate it; they may make the sense of it keener. But it is surely life, Christ’s own Life, which she was thirsting for, and which must bind her more closely to those whom she loved upon earth, however little they may be able to apprehend their union to her.

‘I always say to myself when the question presents itself, shall we recognise each other hereafter? Ah, how little we have recognised each other here! May not that be the first great step in recognition? I hope and trust that a number of hindrances to recognition and sympathy will be taken away, and that those who have had most of the taste of love will find that it is only the foretaste; that as it had its first seed, so it has its full fruit in the Kingdom of God.

‘Will you give my kindest remembrances to all the mourning circle, and the tender love of my wife and myself to the sister, whom we must always regard as a part of her. Perhaps some day she will let us know more of her.

‘Thank you deeply for all your kind words to me and your kind invitation. I have no pretence for regarding myself as ill; those who have had the pain you have known would smile if they could understand how little right I have to the name of invalid. Only having had rude health for sixty-three years, the sense of any incapacity for work seems strange and like a note of breaking up.

‘I am afraid sometimes that I only feign, to get a new proof—having thousands already—how loving my friends are.’

To Miss Martin (returning thanks for a translation of Guizot's Lives of Louis IX. and Calvin).

‘1 South Parade, Bath, March 25, 1869.

- ‘I thank you most gratefully for your present of the entire volume, which I had before received from you in detachments. It will be very valuable to me for your sake, and as a specimen of what may be done with a French classic by a masterly translator.
- ‘Is that the way to speak of a book written by such a man as Guizot? You may blame me much, but I confess the chief worth of it to me is that which your kindness and your labour invests it with. The plan of combining the two lives as specimens of different forms of French spiritual life seems to me excellent; and M. Guizot's appreciation of them as such specimens must be very instructive to foreigners. But it seems to me that chapters vi. and vii. of the life of Calvin—which are, I suppose the most elaborate in the book, and will be accepted as most successfully representing the philosophy of the nineteenth century—are fatal evidences against the writer's capacity for estimating either the hero of the thirteenth century or of the sixteenth; or of showing us what a knight or a reformer in our day must be if he is to make the next generation better than this. The grandeur and the usefulness of both Louis IX. and Calvin arose, it seems to me, from their setting God before them as the ground of their existence and their work. Belief in a righteous God made Louis a righteous king. It might be an imperfect apprehension of God's righteousness which made him a crusader; but the thought of his heart was that the true God was fighting against a false god whom the Islamites had set up. Belief in God as the ground of all salvation was the power by which Calvin contended with belief in a Church which could make a God and could save from God. That he narrowed the purpose of God and denied His will to save mankind, made him an imperfect witness against the worshippers of false gods; ultimately produced, in his own community, that worship of a God of Damnation, against which this age revolts. But to make the deliverance from that terrible mischief a denial that God is to be first in our thoughts—to substitute a theory of human free-will for a theory of Divine predestination—to say that because we cannot conceive God, He cannot make us know what He is and what His purpose to our race is—I must deem the most grievous of all possible mistakes. I cannot break the chains of Romanism or of Calvinism from my own neck, each in turn binds itself so fast to different convictions of my heart, to different testimonies of my understanding, unless I can inwardly believe that God has manifested Himself in His Son, as the Deliverer of Mankind, as able and willing to regenerate every human will by His Spirit. Unless we are baptized with a fire, like that which burnt in St. Louis and in Calvin, I do not think the Church or the age will ever shake off the external trammels which held fast one or the other. Philosophy utterly fails before the zeal and passion that were in each; it can only talk about them and pay them compliments and say that they do not belong to our time. It cannot show what our time has to do that it may not sink into a far lower state than that of Mediæval Christendom or of the Genevan society which Calvin governed.

Should not a Sunday library, if it is to show wherein Sunday differs from a mere Saint's Day, be a witness for God, not for the impossibility of knowing what He means and for the necessity of only taking account of human virtues or graces? Oh, if you knew what bitter charges I bring against myself for failure in bearing this witness, you would not think I was finding fault with any others except because I believe they might do well what I have done ill !'

To the Bishop of Argyll.

'MY DEAR BISHOP,

'Cambridge, June 3, 1869.

'I have never read any writing of Hutton's which would lead me to suspect him of any Romanist conceptions about the Eucharist. When any of us try to conceive a Sacrament we do, in the admirable language of our article, "destroy the nature of it." The idea of a Sacrament must involve a paradox—the paradox of theology, the paradox of our human life. To bring it under the terms of a definition, to set it forth as a formula, is simply to take the Sacramental essence out of it. Protestants perform this process of Transubstantiation as much as Romanists. And there are times when the consciousness of the contradiction becomes so strong in our mind, when we are so disgusted with our intellectual experiments, that we plunge back into sensualism as the only possible escape from notions which we feel to be cold and dreary, and which we suspect are untenable. The bread and wine, are they not actual food? are they not better than mere theories? But surely they cannot be only bread and wine if they are better. What else? There, no doubt, is all Romanism close at hand. And then there must be a new theory to explain the difference between these elements and all others. What or who has descended into them? Who brought about the change? Who, but the priest and his wonderful invocation? It is true, as you say, that these thoughts connect themselves with the belief of the Incarnation; that is to say, with the belief of Christ's descent into flesh and mortal condition, severed from the belief of His ascent into the glory which He had with the Father before all worlds. Restore that belief to the Church, which has nearly departed from it, and all dream that priestly intercession brings Christ back into these more than earthly limitations becomes hateful; the Eucharist, the communion with Christ where He is, with the Son of man as the Head of humanity, as the perfect Image of the Father, scatters that dream far more effectually than all arguments. In fact, no arguments can scatter it, till we labour, instead of defining the Eucharist, to give it an honour which it has never had. Till we accept it as the very organon of scientific theology and of social life, we shall never get rid of the abuse which has clung to it. Nay, it will still continue to be the symbol of all the divisions of Christendom, when it is meant to be the expression of our unity.'

'Middleton Lodge, Richmond, Yorkshire, September 22, 1869.

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,

'I see that you are to preside at the Educational Section of the Social Science Meeting at Bristol. I wish I could be there for many reasons; I have great affection for the place and for many of those that dwell in it. And I think your section especially has done much good, and may do much more.

'One subject is much on my mind, which I should have tried to speak of if I had been with you; perhaps you will introduce it or tempt some other person to do so. I do not know any man who has seriously thought of our present examination system who does not feel that it is undermining the physical, intellectual and moral life of young men, and that it may do this with even more terrible effect for girls, if they are admitted, as of course they should be, to all the privileges of the other sex. You must be aware of all the degrading talk, about what will pay in an examination, which is heard at the Universities. You must know well that noble intellects, which crave for a free culture, are dwarfed by the notion that what they have read and thought is not to be tested and ascertained by the questions of wiser men, but that they are to read and think simply with a view to the questions. You know how parents and physicians alike groan over the loss of physical energy, and the shattering of the nerves which they see in young men who have either succeeded or failed in their trials. And what is the reward? A writer in the Cambridge University Gazette, who possesses considerable experience, declared the other day that he could not get men to take any interest in Shakespeare unless there was a competitive examination in him, with a Tripos list! It is to this state of things that we are coming.

‘And for the girls! Will any of the accomplished medical men, in the city where Beddoes preached so grandly sixty years ago about the tortures of female schools, justify the use of these racks for the limbs of daughters as well as sons? As far as they have yet gone, I believe the examinations, to which they have been submitted, have been merely honest tests of what they know without the straining of competition. That I am satisfied will be the case at Cambridge while Mr. Markby conducts the arrangements of them. But I do tremble lest the desire for equality should lead to their being equalled with us in fate more than in renown. I am rejoiced indeed to find that Miss Wolstenholme, in her excellent essay on the education of girls, demands guidance chiefly as to the way of learning and teaching, a guidance which, as she well observes, may be obtained from lectures by experienced men—which I hope she does not expect from competitive examinations.

‘The disease is becoming a very serious one. I can get no one to think of it seriously enough, or to suggest any remedy. So it goes on increasing, people deciding generally with a shrug that it is a necessary evil! I believe the Social Science Association exists to fight against necessary evils. May I press this one upon its members? Some of them may see their way about it far more clearly than I see mine. If you will only bring it under their notice I am sure you will do good. I prefer writing a letter to elaborating a formal essay; but I cannot say how much the matter presses on my conscience.’

In the beginning of October, 1869, my father resigned the chapel of Vere Street. Dr. Radcliffe, who had for some years attended him—refusing all fees—had insisted upon his giving up either Vere Street or Cambridge, hoping that he would decide to live altogether in London again. He chose, however, to remain altogether at Cambridge.

To Mr. Drake.

‘4 St. Peter’s Terrace, Cambridge, October 11, 1869.

[After mentioning that he has resigned the living at Vere Street] ‘I have had such loving and kind friends there that I feel much the parting. But I believe at present Cambridge is the place for me. There also I have met with toleration and affection such as I could not have dreamed of. If I could only show my thankfulness for it by doing my Master’s work a little more faithfully!’

On November 7th, 1869, he preached his farewell sermon. People had come up from all parts of the country to hear him. The church was crammed throughout. Numbers remained standing through all the service. There appears to have been no record kept of the Communion attendance, but, I understand, there were 330 who remained for it. He startled his hearers by choosing the text, “Plead thou my cause, O Lord, with them that strive with me, and fight thou against them that fight against me.” To many who were present the words as he read them conveyed the sense of an appeal against those who throughout his life had misunderstood, or opposed him. The thought had not crossed his mind. It was an appeal to David’s God as the trusty friend of man, three thousand years ago, against the common enemies of man; an appeal to the God revealed by Christ as more to be trusted as the friend of man than He was known to David to be.

“I have abstained—habitually, deliberately, abstained from speaking of Him as a mere Sovereign Power who treats evil as something which is contrary to His decrees, and therefore which, being omnipotent, He can punish. Against that conception of Him and His ways, I have been sure that I was called to struggle whenever I was speaking to you—whenever I was alone in my chamber. I repent of having struggled against it so feebly, of not having lifted up my voice against it more constantly in season and out of season.” “It is not a safe thing, my friends, whatever we may be told, to tempt men into thinking of God as their enemy; it is a safe thing, at all times and in all places, among all people, to say He is for you, whoever may be against you. He will plead your cause. He will fight with those that rise up against you.”

“Among all people. And therefore I have not ventured, although I have felt the temptation as much as any one could, to draw a line between one class of men and another, to call those on this side of the line righteous or believers, those on the other side of the line unrighteous or unbelievers. I have not ventured to do it because then I must have assumed that there was some one who might say ‘Plead thou my cause, oh, my God,’ and some one who could not say it; some one who had earned a right to ask that his enemies might be fought against, some one who had no such right. And I know who that some one must be. I must take my portion with the unrighteous and unbelievers; for I am conscious of an unrighteousness and an unbelief in myself which I cannot be conscious of in another. Those are my foes. If I have courage to pray that God would fight against them in me, I must believe that He will fight against them in you. I must exhort every man to believe that, and at every moment, in every struggle with any impulse or passion which is overmastering him, to act as if he believed it.”

There are in the sermon, in which he sums up the preaching of his life, several passages which were felt at the time by those who knew him to be strangely touching; which perhaps may be so now to any one who realises what the nature of his influence had been. Neither among his immediate friends, nor as far as can be known in that Vere Street congregation, was there one, who did not widely differ from him, on some point of thought and opinion, on which he felt very strongly. His anxious desire not to become a party leader, not "to form a party which should inscribe 'no party' on its banners," had been so far entirely fulfilled. But this particular form of it had been the less difficult of fulfilment, that, though those who were attached to him and were in many ways influenced by him belonged to every kind and shape and form of party in Church and State, yet all or almost all belonged to some party or other, and many if not most were vigorous partisans. There were strong Conservatives, there were most determined Radicals, there were resolutely partisan Whigs, all of whom could be named as regular attendants at Vere Street, or in other ways specially attached to him. So too there were men and women essentially High Church partisans; many in a negative sense, as against High Churchmen, strong Low Churchmen; and, in and out of Vere Street, there were not a few, who, professing attachment to his name, yet dubbed themselves habitually by the title, the most offensive to him of all, because most nearly designating the new party he dreaded—Broad Church. There were some, who, professing specially to understand him, called him by that name, though it represented the denial of all for which he had striven in life. He did not, in the sermon, bate a jot or tittle of his assertion of "the Communion of the Body and Blood of Christ, as the great witness against Sectarianism." He asserted for himself as his business to try to show "that the Church exists for the whole land; that it may comprise all varieties of opinion, but can never stand upon opinions; that it is the Church of the living God;" but he goes on, "I know that numbers of men, in all parties and schools, are practically bearing that testimony much better than I have borne it; that they are giving daily proofs of their zeal for the whole society and for its individual members, which I have not given. Still, I think, it may be good, here and there, to have a man who holds himself more aloof from every school and party, than it is perhaps possible or right for most to do, not because he wishes to see the faith of any one of them crushed or weakened, but because he believes there is a stronger faith, which they all profess, and which their hostilities are undermining. I feel keenly how difficult it is to maintain this ground without an appearance of arrogance, as if I had discovered some better and higher principle than my neighbours, or were more consistent with the one which they acknowledge, than they are. I hope you, who know me, will believe that that is not what I mean. But this appearance of presumption may produce a separation from those with whom I ought to work, through my fault, not theirs, which is real. Such a separation must enfeeble all the words which I speak on behalf of unity, and therefore it is one of the signs which show me that henceforth some other voice may teach you better than mine."

To Mrs. Lindesay.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,

'Cambridge, November 23, 1869.

'I feel that my work in London would have been particularly embarrassing at this time if I had remained. I should not have known how to act with respect to this revival movement. To throw cold water upon it would have seemed to me wrong; yet I could not have joined it, without adopting a style of preaching, that appeals to the senses more than the spirit. Perhaps those who conduct it may ask the present incumbent, as they did me, to use St. Peter's for the purpose of addressing the outcasts. If he consents, he may gather another class about him, and may make the Church more a witness to the poor than I have done. I have hoped much that a Gospel might go forth to them, though I might not be the instrument of delivering it.

'Dear friend, I think that those who have left us are perhaps helping us all to understand the Gospel, and are themselves, in ways we cannot guess of, proclaiming it, as well as joining in our worship.

'God give us more and more of fellowship with them and with Him.'

The Bishop of Argyll was now beginning to edit a series of pamphlets to be called 'Present-Day Papers on Prominent Questions in Theology.' He had put forth an announcement of them in an "advertisement," prefixed to the first of them, in which he had said that "Revelation" means the giving of light, or the removal of a veil. A critic had said, that this sense of the word was inconsistent with the reverence due to Scripture.

To the Bishop of Argyll.

'Monat, Torquay, January 21, 1870.

'Your critic is indeed strangely feeble in his New Testament criticism. I think I could undertake to show that the meaning given to the word Apocalypse in the book bearing that name, is the one which is given to it wherever it occurs in the Gospels, or in the Epistles of St. Paul, and that the sense, which we have substituted for it, would make nonsense of every passage where it is used. I propose to read through the New Testament, with especial reference to this word.

You may have the results, if you wish, for your papers.

'As to the Church, I have copied out a number of meditations and prayers which express much more nearly than I could in any discourse my thoughts about it. The writer of them, whoever he is, would wish to remain unknown. If you would like to have them they shall be at your service, but I will not send them till I know whether you think they would answer your purpose.'

As a consequence of this letter the "Meditations and Prayers" appeared in the first volume of the "Present-Day Papers," and my father undertook the proposed task as to the word Revelation. The result was published in the second volume of the papers, under the title of "Use of the Word Revelation in the New Testament," in which he takes every text where the word Revelation occurs, and discusses its meaning and use.

To the Rev. F. J. A. Hort.

'MY DEAR HORT, 'Monat, Torquay, January 21, 1870.

'... Thank you much for what you say about my book [on National Morality]. Davies has very kindly written a notice of it in the 'Fortnightly.' It was exceedingly courteous of the editor to tolerate such an article. I am afraid the Comtists themselves will not give me the credit which I accept most thankfully from Mr. Westcott. I do think we owe them very much, for forcing us to ask ourselves what we mean by Humanity and how we connect it with Theology.

'In conformity with your suggestion, I am purposing to give private lectures when I return to Cambridge. I mean to take Locke, as the starting-point of Modern English philosophy, and as being so characteristically English in his faults and virtues, so unintelligible in his looseness and contempt of system to Frenchmen and Germans. I am reading him over carefully and am even more amused than ever before with his honest effort to look facts in the face, and the perverse way in which his "ideas" disturb his facts, and make him not half as much a witness for the senses as he ought to be. It is a capital joke that the child has no innate idea that whatever is, is, but has an idea of the milk. He could not get so far as to say that it had a taste of the milk, and no idea at all about it. True æsthetics must have actually nothing to do with notions or ideas. Kant's great merit, I fancy, was in perceiving this, in thoroughly distinguishing the sensual from the logical intellectual region, and then in using his logic to show under what conditions we use our senses. Mill, it seems to me, with all his clearness, can never escape from a perpetual confusion between these two regions. If he did I should not despair of his ascending into the higher ideal region—the purely spiritual—which is so much more analogous to the sensual than to the intermediate one. But I must not trouble you with more of this talk. . . .'

The question of female suffrage had come very prominently forward in the early months of 1870. My father wrote a letter to the Spectator strongly supporting the proposal. An interesting correspondence followed between him and Mr. J. S. Mill, who was very anxious to induce my father to speak at a public meeting on the subject.* My father declined from a distrust of his own effectiveness as a speaker at a public meeting.

In March 1870 Mr. Leslie Stephen contributed to 'Fraser's Magazine' an article on "Broad Churchmen." It attributed to the Broad Church party views which my father strongly held, and in fact quoted, not without an important modification, from a speech which my father had then recently delivered at Cambridge in which he had maintained his life-long thesis that the theology of the English Church as displayed in her formularies is larger, truer, deeper than the current theology of the nineteenth century. Mr. Leslie Stephen commented upon the à priori absurdity and improbability of the men of the fifteenth century being wiser than us of the nineteenth, and he led through to the conclusion that whoever held so absurd an opinion must necessarily have been "unconsciously biassed in his reasonings by the desire to reach certain foregone conclusions."

Mixed up with statements which my father had made, not by any means in the form given in the article, were others placed with them and assumed necessarily to be held by the same person, such as that "the legal restrictions upon the clergy are the measure of the moral restrictions," a sentence which it is hard to match as a statement of the exact reverse of what my father did believe. He had more than once written, spoken and acted on exactly the opposite thesis. It is difficult to understand how a man of moderate seriousness of purpose could have stated, as an exemplar of my father's belief, that "if an assertion that God is God and Mahomet is His prophet should be declared by those who imposed it to mean a belief in Christianity, it might doubtless be taken in that sense by a scrupulously honest man."

* This is only one of several subjects on which interesting interchanges of thought with other men cannot here be given. If hereafter there should be a wish for more of my father's letters on special subjects, I am not by any means sure that some that I have omitted are not at least as interesting as those I have chosen. The determining principle of selection has been the wish to make the biography—the story of the life—as complete as possible.

Even in the statement of those views which my father did hold, Mr. Stephen had so put them that my father, if he had read them in their setting by Mr. Stephen, would certainly have repudiated them. That the Thirty-Nine Articles contained "the highest expression of wisdom that the human brain can comprehend," was, one would have supposed it unnecessary to state, an opinion, not my father's, or anything like my father's. That fixed laws are better than the waves of an infallible public opinion which changes every hour, and that the sixteenth century was a time of deeper thought than the nineteenth, is a statement which may fairly be travestied into the other by a comedian, scarcely by a man engaged in a practical discussion.

There was this weakness about the argument, that à priori assumptions of what is likely to be the case do not prove much against positive evidence of what is the fact. My father, and not some imaginary ideal Broad Churchman, had expressed his preference for the older theology, and it was not the fact that my father had been born or educated under the circumstances which Mr. Stephen had so clearly proved must be the only ones that could be the cause of such folly. Apart from this fact, it was scarcely fair to select, as the test representative of a large body of clergy, a man who had never, in any writing of his, mentioned that body except in order to say something against it as a party. There had been, no doubt, a considerable number of men who were anxious to make a party leader of my father whether he would or no; but, apart from the absurdity of insisting upon a man's being exactly that which it is the object of his existence to oppose and to destroy, the party which had gradually accepted the name of Broad Church, did in fact, in so far as it was agreed upon any specific tenets, differ very widely from my father in some of his strongest opinions. The only body which could fairly be called "the Broad Church party," consisted of the men, who did not agree with my father, in thinking parties in the Church—sectarianism of any kind—an evil of so grave a kind that no motive could excuse the formation and organisation of a new party, while yet they desired to oppose what they looked upon as the narrowness and dogmatism of both the older parties. Of these men Dean Stanley had been for all practical purposes for many years the leader. My father's personal regard for him was very great; my father's admiration for his courage and for his readiness on every occasion to defend the weak against the strong, was unbounded. On one occasion, before the Dean had begun to be the object of the attacks to which he was subjected in later life, my father, in reply to an inquiry why it was that the religious newspapers and their following tolerated in Dr. Stanley what they would have denounced in others, answered at once, "Because they cannot help knowing that Stanley has done more than any other living man to make the Bible a reality in English homes."

But their views on many points were very wide apart. My father always complained that Dr. Stanley looked at things from a purely historical point of view. He used to say that Stanley was a "bigot for toleration." I think my father's letters, in 1868, to the Daily News, with their references to Erastianism, marked a parting point between them. Dr. Stanley more and more used to speak of himself as "an Erastian of the Erastians;" and perhaps from that time a little more definitely than before, he began to consider that it was better to organise the straying elements of liberal churchmanship, in such a way as to enable them to work together, and act as a body. The fact of my father's being an older man, to whom the Dean confessed many obligations as a leader of thought; that my father had borne the brunt of many fights in behalf of fairness and justice, and that the Dean had himself brought many men under my father's influence, all tended to delay the Dean's accepting a position, which was thrust upon him by my father's absolute refusal of it, and by the desire for some leader among the liberal clergy. The result was inevitable, seeing that the Dean did not share my father's views in regard to parties in general. But it was also inevitable that my father should feel a certain pain in seeing a man, for whom he had so much regard, create or render possible that very "party inscribing 'no party' on its banners," which had largely come into existence under my father's influence, which tended to absorb into it those men whom he had hoped to see become a leaven working against sectarianism, and for positive faith among all Churchmen, instead of becoming a new, badly organised but powerful sect, more negative in its tenets than any other.

Mr. Leslie Stephen's article brought this relationship of my father to the Dean, and of the liberal Churchmen to both, to a crucial test. The Dean, seeing that the whole point of the article turned on the false assumption that my father was a representative Broad Churchman, wrote a letter on March 19th, 1870, to the Spectator, asking what Broad Church leader had said the particular things which Mr. Stephen charged against them.

In the previous week, March 12th, a letter from my father, signed "An English Clergyman," had appeared, dealing with the subject which had given occasion to Mr. Stephen's article,—a pamphlet from Mr. W. G. Clark, assigning his reasons for abandoning his orders. Mr. Clark had declared that he was not willing to hold himself to articles, which had been composed at a time, when the absolute infallibility of the Scriptures had been so little called in question, that no dogma on the subject is to be found in them. My father, in a long and full letter, maintained that this was not the reason why no dogma on the subject appears in the Articles.

‘ March 12, 1870:

‘I believe that the attachment of the reformers—of Luther specially and characteristically—to the scriptures was of a kind which would make a dogma about the infallibility of the writers unnatural and even distressing to them. Prophets and apostles were their teachers, and were also in a most intimate sense their companions and friends. They must regard them as sharers in their own passions, doubts, contradictions.

‘Luther revered St. Paul, not in the least that he echoed an opinion which Luther had brought to the study of him. It was that he delivered Luther from a host of opinions, which had been anguish to his soul, showing him that there was a direct access for him to a God of righteousness and truth. And thus was born that kind of affection for the scriptures which has characterised the people, far more than the learned, of the Protestant nations.'

My father had gone on to speak of the Articles as composed under this influence, and therefore everywhere appealing to the Living Word, reverencing the scriptures in so far as they helped to reveal Him. He contrasted with this appeal the tendency shown by the clergy, who had attributed to the scriptures the title of the Word of God—an expression not to be found in any passage of the Bible in which the name Scripture could be substituted for it. The Living Word he treated everywhere as the ground of the Articles, that to which they always appealed.

On March 26th appeared a letter from Mr. Stephen, in which, without acknowledging that he had been referring to my father, he left so little doubt of it that the Spectator assumed in a note that it was of course of my father that he had spoken.

On April 2nd appeared two letters, one from "Anglicanus" saying, "I trust that whatever may be Mr. Maurice's wishes about belonging to this or that school, no school or section of the Church will be so foolish or so narrow as to desire to disown or exclude him." The other was a long letter from my father claiming to have used, not the words that Mr. Stephen had quoted, viz., that "the Thirty-Nine Articles expressed his deepest convictions in unequivocal language;" but that "the Thirty-Nine Articles expressed some of his deepest convictions in unequivocal language." He went on to state what these were, and as showing his belief that both the 16th and the 19th centuries had each their own work to do, he continued: "I think the last three centuries have developed the need, of a humanity far more comprehensive, of a theology more spiritual, than the best men of the 16th century would have recognised.

But I think that the groundwork of this theology and this humanity are laid bare in the Thirty-Nine Articles; that for that groundwork all our different schools are trying to produce feeble and crumbling substitutes; that we must recur to it if we would pass the narrow dimensions of Calvinism, Anglicanism, Romanism; if we would learn what a message we have for Jews, Mahometans, Brahmins, Buddhists; for all the nations of the earth as well as for our poor people at home."

The following week appeared a letter signed "A Broad Churchman," which is exceedingly interesting as showing the way in which my father was often misunderstood. He referred to the passage I have given above thus: "He [Mr. Maurice] suggests an impossibility when he advises us to make use of the Thirty-Nine Articles as the 'groundwork' of our thoughts." Now a reference to the former passage will show that my father had said nothing whatever of the kind. Certainly he never had the slightest tendency to make such an appeal. He spoke of the Articles as "laying bare the groundwork," that is the Living Word, the living God. His whole protest was against a series of fine-spun propositions which should whittle away the direct witness of the Articles to one, of whom, as he most often expressed it, "children might be told at their mother's knee that He was 'about their path, about their bed and spying out all their ways,'" to whom each of them might be taught to appeal as their friend to deliver them from all temptations that might assail them, "Plead thou my cause, O God."

The "Broad-Church Clergyman" proved against himself the very thing my father dreaded in that party. He mistook my father's appeal to the living God as an appeal to the correctness of certain propositions. Again, by quoting Mr. Stephen and omitting the word "some" in speaking of the "deepest convictions," he made my father do the very thing he protested against. My father never asked that the Thirty-Nine Articles should limit the thought of the 19th century. The passionate vehemence of the scene recorded at the beginning of Chapter XIV. would have been as ready to break out against any proposal so to limit the work of the Divine Educator, as against the attempt to limit that work by the current opinion of the 19th century. He had urged that the 19th century should not trust to the High Churchmen, Low Churchmen, or to the Broad Churchmen whom Dean Stanley had named, to draw up a series of propositions about our "Common Christianity," omitting as the Lambeth Conference had done all appeal to the Living Word. He would have said that, when Mr. Clark or Mr. Stephen gave up their orders, because they felt they ought not to retain them, they gave a proof, which no phrases about Agnosticism or anything else could affect, that they did acknowledge a voice speaking to them, to which they were bound to listen, which they could know.

To the Dean of Westminster.

'MY DEAR STANLEY,

'March 22 [1870].

'When I read your letter, in the Spectator of last week, I thought I was bound to explain, that you had given me too much credit, in supposing that I retracted the opinions which I had expressed in favour of the Articles; that I retained those opinions still; that I had abandoned any wish for subscription to them, among other reasons because I saw that subscription disgusted the clergy with a document which might be a most valuable guide to them.

'I said at the same time that no person the least acquainted with the literature of the day could suppose that these are the sentiments of the Broad Church school; that I was satisfied, even without your testimony, which was conclusive, that the members of it would agree in denouncing any such doctrine; that the kindness which I had received from many of them was due to their wide toleration of differences, not to their agreement with me on any questions, theological, ecclesiastical or philosophical.

'You are entitled to this explanation. Will you let me tell you why it will not appear in the Spectator? When I heard of Mr. Erskine's departure—just after I had sent off a letter to this effect—I was so ashamed of having talked about myself and about any party matter that I wrote to Hutton begging him to burn it.* The recollection of our friend's loving-kindness gave me a kind of shudder at having entered into such a discussion. It occurred to me afterwards that I had better tell you the fact and the reason, and leave you to make whatever use of the former you think fit. I believe I am “the person” to whom Stephen must have referred; though as I have not read his article I cannot be sure.’

Before leaving this question it will be better to say this much more. My father's repudiation of the name Broad Churchman is often supposed to have been precisely of the same character as the tendency of any party to refuse a title which implies that the tenets it holds are not obviously to all mankind the truth, the whole truth, and the only truth. Just as there are those whom the outer world calls “Irvingites,” or if sometimes “The Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church,” then only as the recognition of a claim by no means acknowledged; just as the Calvinists and all similar sects have their “saints,” of whom the outer world by no means recognises the invariable sanctity; just as the “Evangelicals,” wishing to claim for themselves that they only represent Evangelical truth, dislike the title which implies that those outside the charmed circle take note of the claim but by no means believe it to be an established one; so it is supposed that my father, wishing to claim for tenets of his own an obvious catholicity and a power of convincing the world, repudiated on similar grounds this title for himself.

But this is simply to follow Mr. Leslie Stephen's example: just as he proved to demonstration that my father could not possibly have been the son of his own parents, and could not possibly have been brought up under the conditions under which he was in fact educated, so this is to establish on à priori grounds the certainty that my father did not say anything which is contained in all his books, and did say what is nowhere to be found in any one of them, what is contradicted by every page of this life.

* The letter, as will have been seen, did appear in the Spectator.

For his assertion was in nowise that his views and his opinions were infallible; but, on the contrary, his dread of the name "Broad Church" * was due to his fear lest any men should

* The origin of the name Broad Church was as follows. In an article in the 'Edinburgh Review,' in July, 1850, on the Gorham controversy, Arthur Stanley used these words, "There is no need—although if need there were it could be amply satisfied—for minute comparison of the particular formularies of the Church to prove the general truth that it is by the very conditions of its being not High or Low but Broad;" and a little further on he speaks of "a fanciful division of the Church into schools, which, for the purpose in question, have no existence at all." In this its first use the name was thus not intended at all to mark off the lines of a new party, but to protest against party spirit. But the difficulty in which men found themselves who wished to join in this protest and to avoid connection with either of the established parties, led them to take advantage of the phrase thus used, and to say that they were "Broad." In 1853 a powerful article by Mr. Conybeare on "Church Parties" appeared in the 'Edinburgh Review,' Vol. XCVIII. It treated the name "Broad Church" as an established party designation in common use. It was an article extremely friendly to Archdeacon Hare, my father and their friends. One of Hare's books was taken as the representative of the party, which was said to be an old historical party in the Church; its history being marked by Leighton, Tillotson, Burnet, etc., and in a considerable measure Mr. Conybeare defined the tenets he assumed them to hold. This was the first public occasion in which the name had been used in any such sense. My father, who was specially annoyed at this narrowing of the position which both Hare and he had taken up, always complained that Mr. Conybeare had "bestowed" the title of "the Broad Church." It is evident from the article, however, that Mr. Conybeare had no intention of doing this. My father, in protesting against it recurred precisely to Arthur Stanley's use of the word in 1850: "That the English Church is broad enough to comprehend persons so unlike as these two [Whately and Hare]; that she can claim their different talents and qualities of mind for her service; that those who very little understand each other, may, nevertheless, help different persons to understand their relation to her better, by helping them to understand themselves better; this may be joyfully admitted. But the admission seems to go some way towards proving, first, that a Broad Church party, such as has been dreamed of, is impossible; and secondly, that if it were possible it would be unnecessary, seeing that a body has existed here for about a thousand years which is considerably more inclusive than the new creation would ever become." (From his "Essay on Archdeacon Hare's position in the Church with reference to the parties which divide it," published in 1856 with Hare's be tempted to select, from his writings or those of others, a set of tenets, which they could erect into infallible shibboleths, making a new test for select spirits, whom he believed would be as great a curse for the world, as all such bodies of the "elect" have been as have thought that the "gospel" was an announcement of some special benefits for their own advantage, and of the folly and misery of the rest of mankind.

He believed not that what he saw as truth was a thing to be accepted and followed by all men, but that truth was to be searched for and followed by all men; not that his light was to put out the lights of Irvingites, Evangelicals, Catholics, Scientific men, but that the truth which was seen by each of these was the truth which they were earnestly to preach. Only it seemed to him that, when certain scientific men or certain reasoners began declaring that all the ranges of thought which were not included within their own studies were folly, when they set up for worship not truth but their own omniscience and infallibility, they put themselves exactly on the same moral level as those who, formulating certain phrases, denounce all those who do not accept them.

His whole sympathies had been with the scientific men when they were asserting what they had humbly, patiently investigated, and found out to be true. He was never tired of quoting the spirit of Mr. Darwin's investigations as a lesson and a model for Churchmen. He was indignant at the sneers that Bishop Wilberforce threw out against them, such as, "Would you rather then your paternal or maternal ancestor had been an ape?" He had warned the Orthodox that the sword of Agnosticism which they clutched at from Dean Mansel, would become a much sharper one in the hands of their opponents. When what he had predicted actually followed, and Mr. Huxley and Mr. Spencer adopted the same tone towards all thought but their own, which had before been held by the various religious sects, his fears were in no wise excited lest the negative positions should triumph; though he thought it very possible that they might for a time dominate Public Opinion. He used to say that sooner or later, if that were so, those who are now called "Agnostics" (the name had barely become known during his life-time) must take to persecution, to the suppression of poisonous opinions; and he thought that that change of relative positions would be unspeakably advantageous to the ultimate triumph of positive faith, though he feared that such a spirit as that of persecuting Agnosticism would absolutely put an end to genuine scientific research.

Charges, and republished in 1874 with a new edition of the 'Victory of Faith,' edited by the Rev. E. H. Plumptre, now Dean of Wells.)

CHAPTER XXI.

“Do we indeed desire the dead
Should still be near us at our side?
Is there no baseness we would hide?
No inner vileness that we dread?”

In Memoriam.

THE EDUCATION QUESTION—MEETING AT EXETER HALL ON THE EDUCATION QUESTION—JOHN STUART MILL—THE CATECHISM—SYMPATHY WITH MR. FORSTER’S EDUCATION BILL—PROSECUTION OF MR. BENNETT—FEELINGS ABOUT THE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR —LETTER ON KNOWLEDGE BY THE DEPARTED OF THE DOINGS AND THOUGHTS OF THOSE WHO REMAIN—THE ATTITUDE OF THE RITUALISTS TOWARDS THE COMMISSION ON RITUAL—LIFE AT CAMBRIDGE DURING LATER YEARS—ACCEPTS THE CURE OF ST.
EDWARD’S, CAMBRIDGE—THE SUNNY AUTUMN OF LIFE.

THE Education question had once more become the public question of the day. The period was that intervening between the Second Reform Bill and Mr. Forster’s Education Bill.

‘MY DEAREST E.,

‘Cambridge, March 27, 1870.

‘I thank you very much for your remarks on the St. James’s meeting. . . . You are quite right that Mill has a power of doing justice to the arguments of his opponents which is entirely wanting in ——. But he has not, I think, the capacity, though he would desire it, of entering into that which lies beneath their arguments—those inward convictions which they are often very ill able to express. I do not mean that he is wanting in convictions; he has vehement convictions ; but they are fierce and one-sided, whilst intellectually he is moderate and many-sided.

‘Look at this instance. He can apprehend clearly enough that I as a Churchman may desire to express my particular sentiments, and to communicate them to children just as the Dissenter may desire to express his and communicate them ; just as the Secularist may desire to express his and communicate them. That is admitted, he would say ; but why not agree pro hac vice to suppress your separate wishes and to communicate what you all three hold in common ? The Dissenter is willing to accept this arrangement, so is the Secularist ; why do you stand out ?

‘Now suppose I answered thus. (1) The bond which unites me to the Dissenter and the Secularist is the conviction that God is their Father as well as mine, in a Son of man, who is their Lord and mine. I cannot refuse to tell my children this. In so doing I should break the tie between me and those who differ from me. I should become a mere denominationalist. (2) The belief, that God is the Educator of men and children, is the only strength in which I feel that I can educate them. If I openly suppress this belief while I hold it, I shall really be talking what you would call Religion under the guise of Secularism ; for it is part of my very being ; it must come out somehow. Or if I outwardly and inwardly suppress these beliefs that I may meet your requirements I become merely a machine for conveying certain scraps of information, not a living teacher at all.

‘Suppose I said this. Mill would understand me scarcely better than ——. He would probably say, “That may be a pet fancy of yours, but it does not represent any opinion which would have the least weight either in St. James’s Hall or Exeter Hall, either in the House of Commons or in a Convocation of the Clergy.” That may be true in the letter ; it is not true in the spirit. However clergymen may express themselves—however clerical schoolmasters may express themselves—there is latent in them both a conviction that they are maintaining not a “distinctive” theology, but a common theology; that they are teaching not something which separates one class of the people from another, but something which is wanted to make us a people. That thought underlies all their vehemence, all their awkward and narrow language, and to that thought the Secularist can do no justice, the Dissenters scarcely any. Therefore I cannot resist the conclusion that they are really imposing on the land not a positive, but a negative Secularism; that they require us not only to hide but to abandon the deepest belief that is in our hearts. It may be necessary that this violence should be practised; as far as we are concerned we deserve it. I do not care for the punishment to the clergy, which is good for them. I do tremble for the loss to the people.

‘Perhaps I may write something of this in a letter to our Working College. I could not say what I meant at our meeting. But writing at a distance, and as a stranger, I think I may tell them what is in my heart. . . .’

! He did publish soon afterwards a letter to the Working Men’s College “On Secular and Denominational Education.”

To the Rev. F. J. A. Hort.

‘MY DEAR HORT,

‘Cambridge, April 5, 1870.

‘I could cheerfully, even thankfully, give up the Catechism if it were, or I had ever treated it as being, a summary of the doctrines whereby the Church of England is distinguished from Dissenters. Since they consider it to be such, since so many of us adopt the same opinion, I cannot suppose that it will hold its ground. But I have always contended that by its form as much as its spirit such a notion of it is shown to be untenable; that the ‘What is thy name,’ gives the hint of the most personal as well as the most Catholic, or, to use the modern phrase, the most “unsectarian” education. I should be very loath to give up this testimony just at a time when it seems most needed, when we want most to show that Secularism is narrow and exclusive,

Faith comprehensive. I do not know whether this can be shown by any legislative measure—whether the effort of the State to educate must not ultimately involve the loss of all personality, of all Catholicity in our teachings. I cannot say how much I admire Forster's struggle with the difficulty, his determination to do the very best he can, and by some means to utilise all moral and spiritual forces. I cheerfully signed a petition here in which most joined—in favour of the Bill. But I begin more and more to doubt whether the clergy can interfere with advantage, whether they must not stand and wait, ready to make the best of whatever is done, confident that in time the Comtist doctrine of a distinction between the educating and governing power must be recognised, and that no power can be an educating one which does not appeal to the spirit of the child and the man. In the meanwhile, under the name of Progress we seem drifting back into the old Bell and Lancaster notion of cramming a number of children into a school-room and cramming them with a number of fragments of information—part labelled religious, part secular—which, if they should be able to digest this hard morsel, was to be their education. All our training schools have been experiments for getting out of this rut. It may be that we can only be effectually delivered from it by sinking more deeply into it.

‘If I were a country clergyman I might perhaps think it right to sign your petition.* I can conceive the pressure of local circumstances being too strong to resist. Here I think it is important to show that our formularies enable us to embrace the people; that sects and Secularists alike ignore their necessities, even their insatiable cravings; that the State can only bring them to the water without the least power of giving them drink. . . .’

* Which proposed to avoid the difficulty as to sectarian education by insisting only on the teaching of the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments."

To the Bishop of Argyll.

‘ 3 St. Peter’s Terrace, Cambridge, April, 29, 1870.

‘ MY DEAR BISHOP,

‘ I agree with you in thinking that the Lambeth Conference and the Evangelical are dead ; the Spirit that produced them is of course alive and at work, but it will embody itself in other forms and in those, if God teaches us the right way, should be encountered.

‘ The prosecution of Bennett will be a most serious trial for the Bishop of London [Tait]. To me it is quite clear that the attempt to put down error in that way is an outrageous mistake ; but how he will deal with it when actually forced to pronounce a judgment, I do not know. Instead of complaining that such words should be published I feel profoundly grateful for them. I think they bring the question to the right issue and show us where we have all been wrong. If we do not set forth the ascended Christ as the object of trust and hope to mankind, as Him who by ascending has led captivity captive and received gifts for men, as the centre to whom all may turn, and in whom all are one, the desire to bring Him down from Heaven—to see Him in the elements on the table—will be, as it has been, irresistible. Priests will be believed to possess the power, because the power must be conceived to reside somewhere ; the denial of the Ascension will be called faith in the Incarnation. And it is absurd to say that if we wot not what is become of Him who is gone into the mount, we shall not make a calf and bid men worship it ; there must be a priest-king in Rome if the Priest-King at the right hand of the Majesty of Heaven is not revered there, but is sought to be brought back to His mortal conditions or to an image of His mortal conditions here. If these men are right we must give up saying the Lord’s Prayer. Our Father is not in Heaven ; there is no Heaven ; all is of the earth, earthly. I have felt this feebly for a long time ; now it comes to me with a tremendous demonstration. But oh, how much better it is to be prosecuted than to prosecute!’

To the Bishop of Argyll.

‘MY DEAR BISHOP,

‘Cambridge, May 26, 1870.

‘Your kind remarks on my article in the “Contemporary” [on Newman’s “Grammar of Assent”] have given me great pleasure. I am not accustomed to meet with such sympathy with what I write.

‘I should have quite expected Mr. Wace’s criticism.* But whatever he may say, Luther “tilted at propositions” much more vehemently than I have done. His assertion of the right and duty to believe in God who justifies was the great blow, the deadly blow, to those who make faith consist in assent to propositions. Dr. Newman’s bitter dislike of Luther is due much more to his revolt from Aristotle and Aquinas than to his revolt from the Pope. When Luther, and still more Melancthon, succumbed to propositions in their later days, when assent to the doctrine of justification was substituted for belief in the Justifier, Protestantism went into the lean, sickly, and yet contentious stage of its existence, only to emerge from that into indifference—a mere denial of Romanism. The reformation that we want is the same rise out of assents into faith as in the sixteenth century; only it must be into faith in a God who has redeemed mankind, in whom I may trust because I am a man, and that I may vindicate my rights as a man.

‘Who does Mr. Merivale suppose denies the existence of evil? Why, is not ours the age in which good and evil are to be brought more directly face to face with each other than ever before; in which evil is to be revealed in its fullness and nakedness?

‘I have spoken of this conflict in the paper on Revelation.

* This accidental sentence leaves a very unfair impression of my father’s relation to Mr. Wace, who had contributed to the “Present-Day Papers” a valuable paper.

You will find it, I suspect, rather too long than too short in its comments on the texts which are quoted. It is quite ready. I will send it to any direction you give me at once. In fact, I shall be glad to get rid of it.'

Both at this time (June 1870), in the autumn of the previous year, and at various periods between those times and after, a kind of agitation had begun, which partly showed itself in letters and articles, some signed, some unsigned, which appeared in various newspapers, complaining of the fact that no appointment such as a canonry or deanery had been offered to my father. Not only were all these against his wishes, but in every instance in which he could discover the writer, he wrote whatever form of letter seemed most likely to stop not only such action, but any attempts, of which many were made without his knowledge, to privately urge his claim to some such recognition. Those who made these attempts had to keep them very secret from him to prevent his taking steps that would stop them. The following letter to the Bishop of Argyll, who had just written a letter, with his name, on this subject to the Pall Mall Gazette, will serve as a specimen.

To the Bishop of Argyll.

'MY DEAR BISHOP,

'Cambridge, June 27, 1870.

'I have received a proof from Strahan of my paper on Revelation, which I have corrected.

'I am sure you meant the letter in the Pall Mall most kindly. But may I be permitted to say that the only part of it which gave me real pleasure was the announcement that there is a "vow registered in Heaven" against my promotion? If, as I trust, that is so, I accept it as an answer to prayers which I offered from my inmost heart last autumn, when my friends talked to me about canenries and such things, that I might not be led into temptation by receiving offers which I felt that I ought to refuse. Supposing I could be of any service to the Church, it ought to be much more by enduring something for her—an honour of which I am not worthy—than by receiving olive-yards and vineyards from her. The Prime Minister, who represents the lay as well as the clerical feeling of the country, would I think be utterly wrong if he promoted me. For there is not a journal, from the Saturday Review to the Record, which does not speak of me as misty or mystical; and there is no charge so odious to every class of Englishmen as that. What party in the Church, High, Low or Broad, would not disdain me as its representative?’

To a Son in Germany.

‘MY DEAREST E.,

‘Eversley, July 23, 1870.

‘. . . If you can find real living interest in German movements I would not have you change it for our English torpor. It seems to me sometimes as if the slow disease of money-getting and money worship, by which we have been so long tormented, must end in death, and though I do believe inwardly and heartily in a regenerative power for societies as well as individuals, the signs of its active presence here are not as yet manifest to me. Neither in Conservatism nor Liberalism, as I find them here, can I see what is to make the dead bones stir and live. It may be that Germany may quicken us, or at least that the quickening power which they must seek for now, will also come upon us. We must wait and hope.

‘Meantime you may be getting much wisdom from what you see. . . . The Dean of Westminster and Lady Augusta were at Mr. Powles’s to-day. He is in spirits about the Revision, and is not much disturbed by the attacks on him for the Westminster Abbey Communion, which I think was a greater event than most which have happened in our day.’*

* The Dean had administered the Communion to the whole of the body of the Revisers of the New Testament, including a Unitarian; my father’s delight at his having done so is expressed in many letters.

To a Son in Germany.

‘MY DEAREST E.,

‘Bredwardine, August 29, 1870.

‘. . . As to Germany and France, I wait and tremble. All one hears of German doings hitherto is very encouraging ; everything of French seems to show that the country needs a purification such as it is receiving. But my horror of empires is so great and general that I dread the thought of a revived German Empire, whilst I contemplate with satisfaction the downfall of the French. I wish heartily that Germany should be German and not merely Prussian, but can there not be a unity without the old Roman assumption of which Italians have so much right to complain ? There seems to be a collapse, for the moment, of all the Latin nations ; the curse of the Papacy is upon them. But I do hope to see them rise out of their tomb.’

‘MY DEAREST E.,

‘Bredwardine, September 2, 1870.

‘. . . When will this terrible war be over ? The chastisement of France is awful and surely was necessary. But I fear lest Germany should suffer, not only in the loss of her sons, which is grievous enough, but in the loss of her moral tone, in the growth of a desire for conquest. There is a very able letter of Max Müller in the Times defending Germany and Bismarck and maintaining that a united Germany would be the greatest security for the peace of Europe. But he gives signs of trembling at the sight of an extinguished France. She danced into war as we drift into war ; the grave purpose of Prussia is a lesson to both ; but there is a terror in it too.’

‘20 York Crescent, Clifton, Bristol, September 24 [1870].

‘MY DEAREST E.,

‘. . . I have written an article for the next ‘Contemporary’ about the Athanasian Creed. It is pretty sure to be banished from our service now, and I wish that it should.

- But I wish also to explain what I have meant by reading it while I have read it; since if I had meant what some seem to do, or what the interpreters of the Royal Commission impute, I should be bound to confess it as a sin and repent of the act all the rest of my life. The article will please few people; but it has been a great relief to my own conscience.
- ‘I am glad you approved of the words I wrote about Mazzini. Miss Winkworth spoke to me of them last night with approval.
- ‘We are all waiting anxiously for the result of the conference between Bismarck and Jules Favre; hoping against hope. My fears predominate, yet I can’t but think Paris will somehow be saved. The number of Germans who dread annexation seems to increase: Venice must be a warning to them. The Spectator, in a very good and sympathetic article about the Working Men’s address to the Republic, complains justly of their bitter language about the German middle class. But that is certainly due not to themselves, but to Comtist inspiration. No one who knows the Comtist’s habitual denunciations of the middle class in all lands could mistake it. But it is very mischievous when used to stir up national as well as class animosities. . . .’

To a Lady who wrote to Mr. Maurice after the death of her father, to ask if he believed that the departed have a knowledge of those who remain behind them.

‘MY DEAR MADAM, Cambridge, November, 17, 1870.

- ‘There are two questions in your deeply interesting letter, which seem at variance with each other, and yet which everyone who has felt and suffered at all, knows to be intimately and inseparably connected.
- ‘The first is, have I a right to indulge in the pleasant dream that I may hold intercourse with a friend who has gone out of my sight; is not its pleasantness a bribe to me to warp the evidence; shall I not be believing what I wish for, not what is? The second is, would it be a pleasant dream? Dare

I face the thought of being looked through and through by one whose love is worth all the world to me? Must not the vision of the redeemed spirit be clearer than that of the friend whom I walked with on earth? must he not hate the evil he sees in me and turn away from me? Is it not better that I should be hidden as yet from his gaze; at least till I am fitter for it? Can I bear that he should have the pain of knowing all my wrong?

‘The second question is morally the most important. The other is only of interest when it has been settled. I will therefore begin with it.

‘I. You will not doubt, I think, though you may not know as bitterly as I know, that there is a Cain-like going out of the presence of God: a flight from Him as if He were an enemy because He knows what we are and what we have done. And there is surely a gospel inviting us back into that presence, bidding us arise and go to our Father, telling us that a new and living way has been opened for us by which our spirits may ascend to Him. To do that, is, I conceive, what St. John meant by coming to the light that our deeds may be made manifest. It is accepting as a comfort, not as a curse, the belief, Thou hast searched me out and known me. Thou art about my bed and board. Thou spiest out all my ways. Thou understandest my thoughts afar off. To be known thoroughly, known altogether, is the blessing of blessings, for it imports that we are right. God cannot behold iniquity. He sees us as we truly are in Christ. He looks upon us, and regards our evil as far from us. St. John extends this principle a step further. He says, If we walk in the light as He is in the light, then have we fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin. It is high teaching, yet it is confirmed by our commonest experience. We have not fellowship one with another, not with the nearest relations, not with the dearest friends, whilst we are indulging vain selfish thoughts; by their own nature they cast us off from fellowship. And the effort of those who care most for us is to bring us out of those selfish, unreal thoughts ; to bring us back into intercourse with them, to make us trust them. They recognise us as meant for the fellowship ; they deem it a strange anomalous state that we should be out of it. Our absence from it is what causes them their bitterest pain—our return to it is their joy. And when we return to it we become healthy, simple, free from fancies. The law then under which we are placed is the law of fellowship ; to be out of fellowship with God and man is to be in a wrong, disordered condition ; the more we enter into it, the more we become reasonable human beings, what we were meant to be.

‘The pain of being known and discovered in evil is very bitter, may be very acute ; the relief of being treated as if we were distinct from our evil—as if the evil were our worst enemy, as if there were a separation from it—is proportionably great. But it is the very gospel of Christ, the very message of a Life-blood which cleanseth from evil, that we may have this relief afresh every day ; that we may always confess our sins and be emancipated from them, that when we take that course, we do not obtain some rare, extatic privilege, but simply cease to be in an irregular, self-created banishment. If that is so, how can it be more painful to think that the spirits of just men made perfect are looking at us, than that the spirits of the imperfect are looking upon us ? When we are in darkness, we must be out of fellowship with them as we are with the unseen God, as we are with good men on earth. When we come to the light, why should they rejoice less than those who are less purified rejoice ? If they suffer pain it is because we do not come into God’s presence and theirs ; it is because we abide in an unreasonable, untrue state. That they do suffer this pain, I, at least, cannot doubt, while I remember that they are like their Master. The notion of a felicity which hinders them from sharing in His sympathy, in His work of restoration, is to me simply dreadful ; it is to make Heaven selfish, in plain words, to make it Hell. If they are doing God’s commandments, hearkening to the voice of his word, we know that his commandment is to love men, and that Christ fulfilled it by dying for them. You may then assuredly dismiss the dream that the knowledge of our state by those who have passed out of the world can be bad for us or bad for them. To feel pain at the thought that when we are not in our right state we are out of communion with them and with God, must be good for us, might be a most strengthening medicine to us; for them to feel pain when that is so, for them to work that it may not be so, is only for them to have Christ's likeness, to be entering into His purpose.

‘II. What then remains of the second difficulty? You are afraid of indulging an agreeable fancy in supposing that those who have left us care for us, are interested in our concerns, are still occupied in our education. But if you do yield to fancy—if you do not dare to face facts—the thought of that possibility ceases to be agreeable. It is only when you come to the light, when you try to see things as they are, that you can bear to think of any one in earth or in Heaven really knowing you, really having fellowship with you. It is when you resolve to dismiss fancies, to demand realities, that the meaning of this fellowship—of any fellowship—becomes apparent to you. It was not the touch of a vanished hand, dear as that may have been, which educated your mind, which awakened your thoughts and affection and hope. It was not the voice which you heard in your ear, sweet as that voice may have been. It is a most natural, pardonable fancy that these were necessary to your intercourse, even that these constituted it—but you know inwardly that it was not so. Why then should not the education continue when you do not feel the touch of the hand, when you do not hear the voice? “Oh,” you say, “it had so much to do with this earth. We looked at sunsets together; we spoke of our own kinsfolk; there were so many points of little every-day sympathies; we laughed and we wept.” Well, did not God make the sunset? Did He not make it a lesson-book for you, a bond of intercourse between you? Did He not bind you together in a family?

Did He not appoint all the occasions for sympathy? Are not the springs of laughter, as well as of tears, His? Do you suppose that any one is better for being out of sympathy with His works, with His mind? How much do you know of them now? Do you not hope to know much more of them hereafter? "Ah, but these are not the occupations of a disembodied spirit." I dare say you know about disembodied spirits. I know nothing. They seem to me to belong to the realm of fancy and not of fact. Our Lord took all pains while He was on earth to show how much He cared for bodies; He was constantly raising them out of disease, and making them healthy. He bade the body of Lazarus come forth. He gave that as a sign that ALL who were in their graves should hear the voice of the Son of man and that those who hear should live. He brought His own body from the grave. His apostle, who knew most of the redemption of the will from its chains, looked forward to a redemption of the body and of all creation, from the travail to which they were subjected not willingly. He said that if the Spirit of Christ dwells in us He shall also quicken our mortal bodies. Why not believe that those words are spoken simply and sincerely; that they represent facts which have been accomplished, which are accomplishing themselves every hour? You are weary of words which you have heard from me and others about some final deliverance of the human spirit from its sin and woe. You cannot be too weary of them if they interfere in the least degree with the message, I am the resurrection and the life, which was, spoken once to a woman sorrowing for her brother, which is spoken now by the same voice to every woman sorrowing for brother, father, husband, child; an ever-present resurrection an ever-present life; that is the pledge and warrant for all hope of a future resurrection, of a future life. Not a future but an eternal life, the life of God, the life of love, is what Christ tells us of.

'Souls may fly off, perhaps, as the hymns tell us, to distant worlds, to unknown spheres. We may think anything we like about such winged creatures; they have nothing to do with us. But the spirits of those we have loved and cared for, the spirits who have held converse with ours, cannot be changed into birds or butterflies. They must be still human, the more they have entered into converse with the Divine. And why must we force ourselves into the conception of them as without bodies? Is it because they have dropped that which was corrupt and dead, because this has been given "earth to earth, dust to dust"? Was it this dead thing which we saw and heard and handled? Was it this from which sweet words came forth? That which is mortal is gone; is any life gone? Is not mortality opposed to life?

'These, dear lady, are not speculations of mine, if they are, reject them; for you say rightly—my inward conscience responds to the words—that real sufferers cannot endure fanciful speculations, that they require the truth, the whole truth, nothing but the truth. I want to deliver you and myself from speculations which haunt us all, which it is most difficult for any of us to cast aside, but which do, as I have found, most grievously intercept our vision of that substance on which we might rest our hopes for ourselves, for our friends, for mankind. That vanished hand—how many devices there are in modern days, how many revivals of old superstitions, that we may imagine it comes near us! Apparitions!—how many long for them and yet tremble? And all the while you are touched in a thousand ways, to the finest issues, by words which were spoken to you when you grasped the hand. And all the while, what genuine apparitions you have of the actual friend teaching, consoling, reproving. You say those are but acts of memory. Why do you say so? What difference does the explanation make in the fact? The person is there with you, not a semblance of him but he himself, when you are getting a stronger hold of any truth of which he first gave you the hint—when any doubt is scattered on which you wondered together. You need not form a picture of ministering angels. Only suppose that those who were ministering angels by God's own ordinance have not ceased to be so when He has made them more capable of being so; only say to yourself, "It is unreasonable to think otherwise till some overwhelming evidence is offered me that it cannot be so," and you will find that your dream was a reality, that arguments which appeared to overturn it were dreams. Death is itself a mightier argument than all which doctors and preachers can say about death; and yet when you and your father joined with me in the Lord's Supper, we believed, or tried to believe, and knew that we were false so far as we did not believe, that Death, the Death, has been made the very bond of communion between Heaven and earth—between us and angels and archangels. Perhaps I entered much less fully into that truth than each of you did. I have often felt as if he who gives the bread and wine to others might taste less of their sweetness and power than those who receive them. At all events, my own hardness and coldness testify to me how little I can measure the truth by any experience of it that I have ever had. Not the less, but all the more for that, does it bring me the assurance that Death is overcome, that Life has won the day. Not the less does it tell me that it is truth and not fiction, the deliverance from dreams, not the indulgence of them, to hold fast the faith that the veil of flesh has been rent asunder, that for all and for each that invisible world has been opened; that we must have converse with it and its inhabitants whether we desire the converse or shrink from it; that we shall accept the converse when we try to walk honestly as in the day, turning from no task, avoiding all shams and pretences, living simply as if we were in the presence of an innumerable company, and as if those who thought of us most and did us most good when we saw them, had not ceased to think of us because their thoughts have become freer and more loving, have not ceased to do us good, since they have learnt that the great blessing is to do good. If you suppose that they must care for other objects than those which God chose for them, I want to know why, if He indeed cares for those objects—if their desire is to do fully what they did imperfectly while they still wore their grave-clothes, before He said, “Loose them and let them go.”

‘You must forgive this long letter. I tried to answer you more briefly, but did not succeed.’

‘3 St. Peter’s Terrace, Cambridge, December 12, 1870.

‘MY DEAR MR. READ,

‘The appointment of a commission on Ritualism may or may not have been a desirable measure. But the commission has been appointed and has issued a report. The Ritualists may say, if they please, that such a body is not one before which they like ecclesiastical questions to be debated and from which they like recommendations and ecclesiastical questions to proceed. But if so, why do they address this body?

‘The scheme of acknowledging it and then restraining it from considering the very topics which it is called into existence to consider, or bidding it come to a certain resolution about these topics, is in the strictest sense a bull, and I wish it only involved the blunder of a bull. But there is a certain insincerity, in the whole notion of innovators protesting against innovators, of men who dislike the phrase “religious liberty,” as one of the evil watchwords of an age that has thrown off the ecclesiastical yoke, invoking that phrase,—which we are bound, I think, in no wise to countenance.

‘I would resist as zealously as any one the attempts of fanatics to put down Ritualism by force, or to invent new statutes against it.

So far as I see at present, the recommendation of the commission that there should be an easy and cheap remedy for parishes which are aggrieved by the introduction of novel practices, is the only one which can be adopted without infringing on maxims which we are bound to hold sacred in all cases and for all persons. But I think it desirable, as the commission does exist, that it should go into the whole subject and bring forth all the evidence that can be collected. If it makes foolish suggestions, they need not be acted upon ;

if the Ritualists appeal to Parliament against any measures of persecution, we may then be right to join them, and we may be glad that they should recognise an authority for which they generally express contempt.

‘The whole subject has, it seems to me, been strangely misrepresented. The Ritualists say that, at all events, they are magnifying the Eucharist, and that for this merit we ought to overlook what appear to us, though not to them, trivialities. That claim appears to be conceded by their opponents. They scandalise me by practically and habitually denying what I have always regarded as the glory of the Eucharist, that it testifies of a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction, which has been once made for the sins of the whole world; that it testifies that there is an access by the Spirit through the ascended Christ to the Father. Their attempt to bring Christ back to the altar seems to me the most flagrant denial of the Ascension, and therefore of the whole faith of Christendom, that can be imagined. We give up everything to them if we charge them with an excess of belief: the complaint should be of their unbelief. But we are not to punish men for unbelief, but to confess it as an evil to which we are all prone, into which every one of us is continually falling.’

My father’s health was now very much broken, but he could not be persuaded to diminish his work. At the end of 1870 he undertook a task especially trying to a man like him. He agreed to serve on the Royal Commission on the Contagious Diseases Acts, on which he sat from December 7th, 1870, to June 28th, 1871, going up each week for the purpose from Cambridge. At about the same time he accepted the living of St. Edward’s, Cambridge, to which there was no income attached. His parish work was very slight, but it gave him the opportunity of having a class of little children to speak to in church and a fresh opportunity of regular preaching, while there were certain almshouses and a few poor people’s houses which he regularly visited.

To Mrs. Lindesay (after his appointment to St Edward's).

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,

‘Cambridge, January 7, 1871.

‘Thank you very much for your kind and dear letter. Your sister [Miss Williams Wynn] said to me when I first came to Cambridge, “I hope you do not mean to give up preaching.” I could assure her confidently that I did not; but if I had, her words would have shaken my purpose.

I should have received them as a message and a warning.

‘I have always desired to have a church here, and have felt more and more that I could not do satisfactory work among the undergraduates or even give forth fully what I had to say as professor without one. As to salary, I am only following the example of a majority of the parochial clergy in Cambridge, in counting it a privilege to get what income we need from other sources, and to make the Gospel nearly free. There are many great defects in our society here, but I am continually cheered and ashamed by the simplicity, with which men of high accomplishments and comparative poverty reject large livings, and even bishoprics, that they may devote themselves to the work which they think fittest for them. One of our best theologians here, who has done this, has just been endowing really large scholarships out of that which he has earned; for he had no patrimony.

‘My parish is only a very small one, and will give me only too little employment. But the church is in good order, well attended, and the services have been well conducted. I shall not probably enter upon it till March.’

His first service in St. Edward's was his baptism of a little grandson on March 8th, 1871. The baby was a great delight to him. Whenever he could be so he was with the child, watching it and playing with it. He always liked best to have a class of little children in church on the day of a christening. He would then always speak to them of the baptism they had just seen, ask them about their own, about their own names, and so lead on to speak of the little troubles of their life, of the help they had always at hand, of the fight they had to fight. Everything was connected with reality, with life. The one thing he avoided was the encouragement of glib answers, pat by rote, as to where the texts were to be found that proved this and proved that—"what is the order of names from Adam to Abraham," and all that type—which the average church choir boy is apt to repeat with a readiness that simply shocked my father. All that tended to make the children look upon the characters of the Old or New Testament as men of like passions with those of their own time, as meeting with real difficulties, making real mistakes, taught by the same discipline as we are; all this he tried to bring before them. All that tended to make them feel that these men in so far as they trusted in God were helped; that the punishments which fell on them were sent in love for their sake and for the sake of others; all that tended to make them look to Christ as the perfect revelation of the character of God—to Him as one with the Father, in the Spirit; to Him as their helper and friend now—he led them on to speak of and to feel. To children and to country-folks in the parishes where he took duty, it came home as simple, beautiful talk connected with their own lives, not with some matters of which they knew nothing. In parish after parish the country folk had crowded to hear him, and had come away without a notion that they had heard something very recondite. There was no mistaking in a similar way the effect that perhaps even more his presence and his voice, trembling with sympathy, and his reverential shyness had upon children of all ages. By the year 1871 this faculty of attraction had as it were become a part of him, hardly due to action in detail so much as itself a direct personal influence drawing out a corresponding sympathy almost as electricity does by induction.

All through his time at Cambridge till his health quite broke he had most keenly enjoyed his life there. He had usually had his house full of visitors, and had greatly enjoyed the society of the place. He made in various ways attempts to see all he could of the undergraduates. His great wish to be on friendly terms with them made him exaggerate his own unfitness for drawing them out on subjects that interested them. One of his resources was to get some young lady who would break the ice, to come down on a visit. If he could catch one, accustomed to sympathise with her brothers, and ready to be friends with the young men, he was, for instance, at the breakfasts, to which he usually invited as many undergraduates as possible, in his most radiant happiness. As soon as the ice was broken and chat about cricket, boating, the colleges, whatever interested them, had fairly begun, he joined in with hearty sympathy, and, his shyness having fled, that power of diffusing happiness which was a something all his own, affecting all who lived with him, shone out in its full warmth. He had a succession of young lady visitors who so helped him.

Afterwards he would come up to the drawing-room, lay his hand quietly on the shoulder of his lady friend, and say to his wife, to whom he always came to impart his pleasure; "Fancy this child drawing out all those young men, putting us all at our ease and keeping us all in chat, when I was sitting there as glum and stupid as possible!" Always in the same way he caught at every opportunity of pouring forth his gratitude for and appreciation of anything that was done for him by whomsoever it was done; as much for the thoughtfulness and affection with which all his servants waited on him, as for any other service. Quite to the last, if a cab was to be fetched, or some message outside the house to be delivered on a wet day, he was sure to slip out himself to get it done rather than let a maid-servant be exposed to bad weather. This was characteristic of his habit in all household matters. Some time before he left London evidence had been given that it was a great temptation to servants to be sent round to pay the tradesmen's bills. From that time he nearly always went round himself and paid the bills, both in London and in Cambridge, as a duty to the servants. One hardly can go into details, because this kind of taking upon himself the rough and leaving to others the smooth, and if possible at the same time contriving to give some one else the credit of what had been done, extended to every little detail of life. If visitors called on him or were staying with him, who differed from him in points of opinion, his reticence in explaining, urging or enforcing any opinions of his own, unless he was almost forced to speak out, was always marked. No doubt his shyness was partly the cause, but much more than this the dread of trying merely to substitute his opinions for others, to proselytise in any way, was the reason for it. Just as in his letters, if the least hint were given that any correspondent who wrote only wanted a set of cut and dried opinions that would settle his difficulties for him and relieve him from the necessity of working his own way to the light, it was certain that my father would refuse to supply what was wanted; so it was in his own house. There were no sets of opinions established as oracular to discuss which was anathema. All thought from any quarter was welcome, so it was genuine and not sham thought. It was, I think, this, with his sense of humour and hearty appreciation of humour, which gave a freedom and a happiness to a discussion when he was present that yet had always a certain side of solemnity with it. For it was the sense of his always feeling himself in the presence of Truth, as a living person, that was somehow conveyed in his whole treatment of a subject, which made it impossible for it to seem respectful to him to treat him as infallible, which made it so evidently the thing that he would most have hated. No doubt this habit had gradually grown on him. He used to say that if he was during all the later years of his life unwilling to enter into discussion in defence of his own opinions, that was only because his tendency as a young man had been so much of the opposite kind that it had produced a reaction. During 1871 he spent much time with me in talking over the past history of his life and speaking of different periods in it, expressly in order to help me with this work. "I have laid a great many addled eggs in my time," he said to me in rather a sad tone one day, "but I think I see a connection through the whole of my life that I have only lately begun to realise ; the desire for Unity and the search after Unity both in the nation and the Church has haunted me all my days."

To the Rev. F. J. A. Hort (to explain his having signed an address to the Bishops, asking them not to enforce a judgment against Mr. Purchas, a Ritualist clergyman).

‘ March 23, 1871.

‘I thought earnestly about the Purchas judgment before I signed the Address to the Bishops. I should have thought it ignominious to sign any similar address about the Voysey judgment. If, as is affirmed, I am myself condemned by that decree, I would rather ask that it might be enforced against me. I certainly shall not change my style of preaching, or retract any word I have ever spoken, in consequence of it. But it seemed to me that a hard and fast line about a point of ecclesiastical behaviour is almost certain to occasion a schism, in which no principle will be involved, only a defiance of law, and yet in which exceedingly worthy men would, on a point half of honour, half of conscience, be involved. I think the Bishops should be urged and encouraged to strain a point for the sake of averting such a calamity. It is very mischievous that a statute law should be strained, as no doubt it is, to meet a point of supposed policy. But policy becomes moral duty in the case of men presiding over a society in which the maxims of St. Paul are recognised, in which the observance and non-observance of customs are alike to be subordinated to the higher law of charity. I would cut through any knots to get the principle established that the Bishops are fathers, and not either legalists or “unsanctified” rhetoricians.’

To the Rev. J. Ll. Davies (sending him a pamphlet on "Secular and Denominational" education).

Cambridge, May 5, 1871.

'The main motive for writing it was that I might clear up the meaning of some words which I spoke at the last meeting [of the Working Men's College], and might make my position in the College intelligible to the students. If I could do that, I thought I might also remove some of the confusion which beset the subject of education generally, and might justify the principle of Forster's Bill.

'By a coincidence, of which I only became aware after my letter was in print, the committee appointed to deliberate about the establishment of a boys' school in our new rooms, has just brought out its report. All theological instruction being—I suppose after much discussion—omitted in the programme, I should not well have known how to act. I have been much in favour of the movement for setting up the school; I hope it will do much good. I am glad that Brewer and Hughes see their way to join in it. This pamphlet coming out quite unintentionally at this moment, and before the report, will explain why I do not join, while my absence from London will excuse me from any necessity of making remonstrances or being an obstructive. It will therefore be a kind of friendly parting word to the College. It will vindicate what I aimed at there; since I cannot pursue the aim, it is better that they should work out the problem as well as they can without me. I have great confidence that Brewer and Hughes will keep them from going far wrong.

'Whether the pamphlet will be of the least use to outsiders I cannot tell. It has been a deliverance of my own soul, if no other soul responds to it.

'I will try to see the Pall Mall and Guardian, and to ascertain the whereabouts of your Association.* I fear that I am becoming less and less fit for associations. The awkward position into which those clergymen brought themselves who joined the Birmingham League frightens me somewhat ; but my own unsociable temper is probably more at fault. I do not despair of the sunrise when the night is most chilly, and I would cheer my neighbours to hope for it. About the different expedients for keeping ourselves warm and kindling lights while we are waiting for it, I am growing painfully sceptical ; I daresay it is wrong.

* A Church-reform Association.

‘ These difficulties about the College rather increase my reluctance—which had other grounds—to be in London at this time. If I were announced as about to preach, Rawlins would want me to fix a time for meeting the Council, from which, for its own sake as well as my own, I had better be away. I ought to try to be doing something at Cambridge, for I seem to have little vocation anywhere else.

‘ Our love to Mrs. Davies and your children.’

CHAPTER XXII.

The morning breaks, the shadows flee ;

Pure Universal Love Thou art !

To all, to me, thy bowels move ;

Thy nature and Thy Name is Love !

Charles Wesley (The order of the words slightly changed in the third line).

THE LAST HOURS.

THE Bishop of London (Dr. Jackson) urged my father in the beginning of July, 1871, to undertake the Cambridge Preachership at Whitehall. He was now sufficiently conscious of failing health to refuse at first, but when the Bishop urged him, on the ground that there were many who would come to hear him who would not go to hear any one else, he felt it to be his duty to accept. Altogether, the extra work he had taken this year told fatally on him.

A visit to Penmaenmawr in August for a time improved his health. In September he paid his last visit to Oxford, there talking over with his wife all his past connected with it, with something of the sense that the end was not distant.

He preached two University sermons in November at Cambridge, and read an essay at the Cosmopolitan Club. He continued his sermons at Whitehall throughout November and December, 1871, and January (preaching there twice on January 7th), 1872 ; but he was utterly unfit for work.

In the Christmas of 1871 his little grandson, a year old, was an immense delight to him. He was continually to be found playing with the child, and was so full of his delight that he was always talking to everybody about "boy" as he called him. Not long after its birth he had been sorely troubled because the baby had not as yet begun to smile ; a defect amply compensated in the games they had together at this time. But he was getting weaker and weaker. At last he agreed to see Dr. Paget, who at once ordered him off to Brighton.

On February 10th he returned to Cambridge, having lost strength most of the time.

On February 11th he insisted upon preaching both morning and afternoon at St. Edward's, the offertory being for a memorial to Bishop Patteson. It was the last time he ever preached.

The following day he gave a lecture.

On the 14th (Ash Wednesday) he took the service and held a confirmation class. In the evening, though he was so ill that his wife did her utmost to dissuade him from doing so, he went to the service at St. Mary's. It was the last time he was in church.

On the 15th, ill as he was, he gave a lecture at home.

By the 18th he was dangerously ill. He steadily grew worse till March 1st, when Dr. Radcliffe was telegraphed for, and the danger appeared so great that his sons and his sister were summoned. He rallied, and was able to drive out for several days.

On March 12th he was taken up to his nieces' house in Bolton Row, May Fair. Each day he grew weaker, having great suffering and becoming dreadfully emaciated.

On Saturday, March 30th (Easter Eve), he dictated a letter, resigning St. Edward's, and signed his own name for the last time. All through his illness he spoke much to those about him of his sense of having known nothing before of what the sick wanted, and of feeling that if he were to recover he would know better how to help them. So strong was this upon him that, when he made up his mind, after a great struggle, to resign St. Edward's, he said to his wife, " If I have not St. Edward's, at least I hope I may give myself more to the work of the hospital." At another time he said, " If I may not preach here I may preach in other worlds."

At the beginning of my father's illness the Prince of Wales was just recovering from his long illness, and one of the last things my father was able to enjoy having read aloud to him from the newspapers, was a report in the Times of Dean Stanley's sermon on the Prince's recovery. He was greatly delighted with Dr. Stanley's words. Throughout his illness he was continually speaking of sacrifice ; of Christ's Sacrifice being at the root of all things. Once he spoke with great delight to his wife of her brother Archdeacon Hare's sermon on Sacrifice.

The revised Lectionary had just been published. His wife's note-book has this passage about it, "He frequently said that he thought the restoring the Book of Revelations to the regular lessons was the greatest boon that had been given to the Church for a very long time. I constantly read parts of the Revelations to him, and he always entered into them with peculiar delight. Once he said, 'People talk of the poor not being able to understand "the Revelations."' It is just the poor who do take them in, who feel there is something in them which meets their wants.' A few minutes afterwards he added, 'It is just the same with the book of Job.'"

He was continually speaking with horror of the divisions in the Church, and when it was reported to him that some new prosecution was threatened, he became so agitated that he could only be quieted by being assured it was a rumour, not authenticated.

During all the earlier part of his illness, and quite up to the last two or three days, he looked forward to recovery, and spoke of going to his own house at Brunswick Place, which was being made ready for him. He hoped there to see all his friends.

The extract from Mrs. Maurice's note-book given in the note on p. 285, Vol. II., will show that this which follows, reported also in the note-book, was only the continuance of the habit of his life, though the choice of well-remembered words instead of personal prayer was characteristic of a sick-bed. "He hardly ever woke in the night without repeating aloud the Lord's Prayer, and 'the Grace of our Lord,' or 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow.'"

The self-reproach, of which his letters have indicated the existence all through his life—the feeling which is so marked in his letter to his wife of May 21st, 1866, from Oxford (p. 520, Vol. II.)—became more and more pronounced as weakness increased upon him. He could not bear to be told of his having done any good to any one; the sense of unsatisfactory work, of sin, was strong upon him. He poured out his distress to his doctor, who had been with Mr. Erskine under a somewhat similar condition of depression, but had known little of the habitual tendency to the same in my father. To his wife he also spoke continually of the same, adding, “I can only say, ‘Lord, undertake for me.’”

In his extreme weakness he trusted the selection of what should be read to him, to her; and she, who knew his favourites intimately, always contrived to find just what gave him comfort.

“In general,” says Mrs. Maurice’s note of this, “he left me to choose what I should read, and said, ‘Choose for me. I always regret when I choose for myself. You always know what I want. You seem to have an inspiration of what I need.’”

So strong was his feeling of the comfort it had been to him in his weakness to have what was read to him chosen for him, that he said several times to Mrs. Maurice “that he thought his teaching to sick people had not been sufficiently individual, that he had too much chosen the psalm or lesson of the day, and that he had now learnt the comfort of having special parts chosen for them according to their need.”

He took such delight in Miss Winkworth’s translations of the German hymns that he said he must write and thank her for the help they had been to him. His wife’s notes continue: “He did not care for those hymns which dwelt on Christ’s bodily sufferings, but delighted especially in Luther’s. I read him the one for Easter Day. He said ‘That is perfect.’ ‘I thought you would like it.’ He said quite reproachfully, ‘You knew I should.’”

Several times during the course of the illness he spoke—evidently in the same sense in which he used the words “Lord, undertake for me"—“of our Lord’s conversation with the woman of Samaria, and of His telling a woman like her about that water which would be a well of water springing up into everlasting life.”

“On Good Friday,” March 29th, Mrs. Maurice’s diary runs, “he said he wished to read the collects to me. I was frightened, and asked whether I should read them to him. He said, ‘No, I wish to read them.’ With some effort he did so, and said they always seemed to gather up all that was needed. Some hours later (I had been away for a few minutes and on my going back) he said, ‘I don’t know whether you will think it wrong, but I could not help applying the words of the collect “for this family” to this family. She’ [referring to his wife’s maid] ‘was sitting there, and I thought of this family.’ He added, ‘Of course, I take also the universal meaning.’”

In the middle of the night of Good Friday, “I [Mrs. Maurice] said to him the hymn ‘Abide with me,’ which seemed to give him great comfort.” The hymn was always his favourite of all hymns; the one he was sure to select for any service that specially interested him.

“On Easter Eve, after reading to him part of the 1st Peter iii. iv., I said I thought all the part about Noah and Christ’s preaching to the spirits in hell was very difficult. He said it was, and asked for his Greek Testament. An hour or two later he said he thought he saw the meaning—that as the ark saved the eight souls as a promise that all should be saved, so baptism saved those who were baptised, thus figuring God’s salvation of all.

“On the morning of Easter Day he asked me to read to him the 1st of 1st Corinthians, beginning at the 22nd verse. In the afternoon I had been reading to him the walk to Emmaus, and almost unconsciously repeated (thinking of him) ‘vanished out of their sight.’ He said, ‘Yes, vanished out of their sight, which means that He abides with them for ever.’ He said to Julia on Easter Day about the walk to Emmaus, looking out of his window from the bed, ‘All these men who are walking there, with their doubts and thoughts, whether frivolous thoughts or earnest doubts, or whatever they may be, want a Friend to join Himself to them and bring them out; not to quench the doubts, as I too often have done.”

All food was painful and distressing to him. “I have learnt,” he said, “that man does not live by bread alone.” “‘I feel now that I must take food solemnly.’ I [Mrs. Maurice] said, ‘You mean it is sacramental?’ He said, ‘I did not like to use the word, but that is what I mean.’ On the evening of Easter Day Dr. Radcliffe asked him whether the gloom which had oppressed him had been lifted off. He said ‘Yes. There has been more light. It has been an Easter Day.’

“During the night of Easter Sunday he suffered greatly from difficulty of breathing, and from cold death perspirations all night. He was in great anguish of mind. Once he said to me, ‘Ask that these nervous fears may be taken away. Pray.’ I read him part of the Service for the Visitation of the Sick. He said afterwards in a clear, revived voice, ‘Thank you, dearest, that has done me good.’ Later he said, ‘I have two voices, but I cannot silence the second voice as Tennyson did.’ I said, ‘The Lord is my light and my salvation, whom then shall I fear; the Lord is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid?’ He said, ‘That is what I wanted. But’ (after a moment) ‘I did not mean by the second voice what we had been talking of.’ I fancy he alluded to the ‘nervous fears,’ and that he meant by ‘the second voice,’ recollections of what he fancied had been omissions or faults of former years. Later in the night, he asked for the 23rd Psalm (I also read him the 14th of St. John), and more towards morning for part of the Litany. He asked me in the middle of the night whether his sons had been telegraphed for, and as I hesitated he said, ‘Just answer simply the truth.’ I said, ‘They have been sent for.’ ‘Then Dr. Radcliffe thinks me very ill?’ I said, ‘Yes.’ He said, ‘He knows that I am not such a coward that I cannot bear the truth.’ ‘I am not going to Death,’ he said, ‘I am going into Life!’ We sent for Dr. Radcliffe, and he came about 5. A.M. He said, ‘I know you think me very ill. Is it a question of days or of hours?’ Dr. Radcliffe said,

‘Not of days, dear Mr. Maurice.’ He then asked if his sons could come before he received the Communion, and being told they could not, expressed a wish to receive it at once. We sent for Mr. Davies.”

A barber had been engaged to come and shave him, and at this moment it seemed to occur to my father that he would not be able to keep the engagement, and that he ought to apologise for breaking it. He turned to Mrs. Maurice and said, “You will explain to the barber why I cannot see him.”

Having been satisfied on this point “he began talking very rapidly, but very indistinctly. We made out that it was about the Communion being for all nations and peoples, for men who were working like Dr. Radcliffe. Something too we understood about its being women’s work to teach men its meaning. Once Dr. Radcliffe said, ‘Speak slowly.’ He said quickly, ‘You do not want me to speak.’ Dr. Radcliffe said, ‘Oh, tell us all you can.’

“He went on speaking, but more and more indistinctly, till suddenly he seemed to make a great effort to gather himself up, and after a pause he said slowly and distinctly, ‘The knowledge of the love of God—the blessing of God Almighty, the Father the Son, and the Holy Ghost be amongst you—amongst us—and remain with us for ever.’ He never spoke again. In one instant all consciousness was gone, and when I looked up and called him, he did not know me.”

Then, as the breathing became more and more laboured, and at last ceased, there gradually settled down upon the face a look of calmness, beauty, triumph, which remained on it for many hours. Of such a look he has himself said, “As men watch the last breath departing from a dear friend, they seize this language, they feel they have a right to it. They say, ‘A moment ago he was mortal, and now he is free. It has been but a twinkling of an eye, and what a change has come! Though the decaying, agonised frame is lying calm and at rest, he who spoke a few minutes before did not derive his powers of speech, any more than the celestial smile which still remains on the clay, from that clay.’”

POSTSCRIPT.

As soon as his death was known to others a proposal was immediately made that he should be buried in Westminster Abbey. A petition to that effect rapidly received the signatures of men of weight. My father's family, however, each independently of one another, and quite unanimously, agreed that such a funeral would have been altogether contrary to his wishes.

He was on April 5th buried in a vault at Highgate, where already father, mother, sisters, had been laid. Nothing could have been simpler than the funeral itself, but it was followed by crowds, which filled up the roads to the cemetery on many sides. It was a meeting-point to which many men went who had not seen each other for years, and were not likely to meet again.

Then there followed, both in the pulpit and in the press, such a burst of grateful recognition of the national services he had rendered, as fairly staggered numbers who had never heard his name before, or had known him only under false conceptions of him. It was said to me, by more than one man, at the time, that the spontaneity and universality of the feeling was so marked that there did not seem to them to have been anything like it in England since the Duke of Wellington's death. It was the more remarkable because at the moment scarcely a single notice came from his immediate friends.* The blow to them had been too stunning to admit of anything but silence. The recognition was, however, of a peculiar type. It represented the intense feeling of a very great many men widely differing from one another, in all classes and in many walks of life; of great numbers of those who had been concerned in the genuine life and work of the country, no matter to what party or sect they belonged. But the many who do not take interest in what does not affect the current of their own ordinary life knew little of him. It was, considering the number of first-rate artists who had worked with him, a somewhat notable indication of the kind of absence of knowledge of his work which mixed with the loving knowledge of it, and in the midst of what seemed like a storm of universal recognition, when some friend offered to present a picture of him to the Royal Academy; no one of the then Council had ever heard his name or knew anything about him. It would be easy to fill a volume with sermons, papers, poems, each in themselves of great beauty, because literally the secrets of many hearts were revealed in owning his help. So wide-spread and so deep was the feeling, that there came an earnest appeal from the United States for the publication of such a memorial volume, to which America and Australia would have furnished notable contributions. Apart from these, more than such a volume might be filled by the autobiographical records of those who continually wrote to him, to thank him for having led them from scepticism and doubt into firm faith. I do not know of one of his many books which has not been declared by some one to have been the very book that brought them light. But I am sure that the recognition which would have pleased him most was expressed by Dr. Montagu Butler in these words, "Wherever rich and poor are brought closer together, wherever men learn to think more worthily of God in Christ, the great work that he has laboured at for nearly fifty years shall be spoken of as a memorial of him."

* Mr. Kingsley wrote an article in 'Macmillan's Magazine,' but that was some weeks later.

INDEX.

A

ABEKEN, Maurice impressed by, i. 257;
his negotiations regarding the Jerusalem bishopric, 319, 320, 327
Abelard, on the reading of, i. 466
Acland, Mr. (afterwards Sir T. Acland, Bart.), acts as one of Maurice's sponsors, i. 123; letter to, from Maurice on Protestantism and the Papacy, 140; another to, on the spirit of the age, 143; and another on his occupations at Bubbenhall and on the "Oxford movement," 161; visits Maurice at Bubbenhall, 168; urges him to throw his views on subscription into a pamphlet, 169; letters to, from Maurice on the subject, 169-171; letter to, on Alexander Knox, 171; visits Maurice at Guy's, 199; assists in editing the Educational Magazine during Maurice's absence in Switzerland, 284; requests him to speak out on the Colenso question, ii. 451; and begs him to answer two questions, 451
Act of Uniformity, effects of the, i. 1, 2, 6;
Maurice on the repeal of, ii. 357-361
Acts iv. 13, citation from, i. 222
Address from the Working Men of London to Maurice on his expulsion from King's College, ii. 221, 222;
another presented to him by 332 clergymen and 487 laymen, 371, 372
Adullam, Maurice's desire to pass through a cave of, to unite a kingdom, i. 358
Æschylus, "an orthodox Christian," ii. 256; see also ii. 548, 562
"Æterna vita," Maurice's view of the true meaning of, i. 396-398
Africa, Colenso's work in, ii. 295-297
'Agamemnon,' extract from the burden of the first chorus in, ii. 548 n.; reference to another chorus in, 562 n.

'Age of Reason,' on Paine's, i. 385
"Agnostic," origin of the word, ii. 327;
first assumed by Professor Huxley, ib.
Agnostics, diversity of opinion amongst, as to church-going and belief, ii. 327;
antiquity of the sect, ib.; prediction regarding, 609
Agnosticism, Leslie Stephen on Dean Mansel's assertion of the first principles of, ii. 327; Maurice's warning against the sword "forged in a religious armoury," 668
Albertus Magnus, ii. 278
Alderson, Baron, ii. 202
Alexandrian lecture, an, ii. 140
Alexandrian schools of philosophy, best mode of studying the, ii. 56; the Christian school worthy of re-studying, 57
Allen, Rev. John, afterwards Archdeacon of Salop, i. 159; named a Government education inspector, 277; Maurice's visit to, 481; at a National Society Meeting, 545
Allen, Rev. W., Vicar of Walsall, i. 35.
All-Saints' Day, thoughts on, i. 444
American Civil War, Maurice's views on the, ii. 438-440
'Analogy of the Human Mind,' James Mill's, i. 202
Anderson, Rev. J. S. M. ii. 102; his letter to the Principal of King's College, 200; reference to, 204
Anecdotes, &c. See p. 712
Anglo-Prussian alliance, the, i. 324
Anonymous periodical-writing, Maurice opposed to, ii. 321-324
Anselm's 'Monologicon,' i. 466
Antedeluvians, on the ages of the, i. 311
Anti-Corn Law League, Maurice on, ii. 25
Antinomians, on the best mode of dealing

- with, i. 375; and with their objections to infant baptism, ib.
- Apocalypse, on the study of the, i. 218; on the revealing power of the, ii. 355; on the meaning of the word, 597
- "Apostasy, National," Keble's sermon on, i. 160; the actual overt commencement of the Oxford movement, 160
- "Apostles' Club," the, at Cambridge, i. 56, 109, 110; Maurice is toasted three times at, 165; dines with, 547; practical training he received at, ii. 530, 541 n.
- Apparitions, on, ii. 624
- Aquinas, on the reading of, i. 466; revolt of Luther from, ii. 615
- Argyll, the Bishop of, letters to, from Maurice, ii. 383, 390, 516, 517; his wish to preach at Vere Street, 562; attends the "Pan-Anglican" Conference at Lambeth, 565; letters to, 566, 570, 590, 597; his 'Present Day Papers' and on the use of the word "Revelation" in the New Testament, 597; letters to, 614-616
- Aristocracy, Maurice's views on, ii. 128-132; on the use and abuse of an, 558
- Aristophanes, on the study of the works of, i. 217
- Aristotle, the "Politics" of, i. 217, 465, 466; ii. 39; on the relative merits of Plato and, 38, 39; his worth, 436; revolt of Luther from, 615
- Aristotelians, education makes men, i. 207
- Aristotelianism, nothing at Oxford but, i. 207; Gladstone's, 302
- Armies, on the power of, for evil or for good, ii. 419
- Arnold, Dr., his saying regarding the early Church, ii. 146; his views on future punishment at variance with Maurice's, 149
- Arnold, Matthew, his essay on Spinoza, Maurice's view of, ii. 441
- Articles, on the utility of, ii. 228
- Articles, the Thirty-nine. See Thirty-nine Articles.
- Asaph, Bishop of St. See Short, Bishop.
- Ascension, priestcraft involves a denial of the, ii. 517, 614
- Ashley, Lord (afterwards Lord Shaftesbury), strong feeling on the Jerusalem Bishopric, i. 320; Maurice's letter to, on "right and wrong ways of supporting Protestantism," 343; uselessness of the appeal, 344, 352; references to, ii. 65, 120
- Associates, account of one of the tea meetings of the, ii. 61, 62
- Association, co-operative, on the principle of, ii. 40-49; Maurice's creed of, 113-116. See Co-operation
- Associations Ouvrières, the, in Paris, ii. 13
- Associations, Working men's. See Working men's associations
- Athanasian Creed, Maurice's views on the, ii. 146-149; what it has done for the belief of the West, 392, 393; the use and abuse of, 393; what it means, and what it does not mean, 412-414; what it teaches regarding eternal life and eternal death, 414-417; on the damnable clauses of the, 416; tells lessons about the Eternal Name which we have lost, 443; on the meaning and teaching of the, 482, 484, 563; an article of Maurice's on, 618
- Athanasius's book against the Gentiles, value of, ii. 57
- Athenæum*, the, origin of, i. 78; Maurice's contributions to, 78; becomes editor of, 79; Carlyle's account of, and its conductors, ib.; extracts from articles of Maurice's contributed to, 80-87; letter to Julius Hare regarding, 96; various critical opinions regarding, 97; it is found to be a pecuniary failure, 98; Maurice ceases to be editor of, 99; retrospect of his connection with, 177
- Atheism, the danger of the time, i. 369; ii. 152, 239; the real issue is between trust in a living God and, 444; the substitution of Dogma for God leads to, 571
- Atheistic? are not we, i. 459
- Atonement, on the power of the, ii. 22; how it is hidden, 234; belief in the, the one protection of men and nations, 262; Maurice's idea of, 272, etc. 326; the main subject of all preaching should be the, 365; and of prayers, 365; on the power and effects of the, 365-368
- Atwood, Rev. A., Letter to, 312
- Augustine, his 'De Civitate,' i. 217; on the importance of, 466; on the influence of, in the modern world, ii. 109-111; on one of his sermons, 140; and his power as a man, 140-142; on his doctrine of the fall, 166; his post-baptismal life divided into three parts, 166, 167
- Authors, representative, on a course of reading, i. 217; Maurice's habit in studying, ii. 511, n.

Autobiographical letters of Maurice (1866), i. 12-21 (1870), 173-184 (1870); 235-240

B

BAPTISM, Dr. Pusey's tract on, i. 182; represents the parting-point between Maurice and the Oxford school, 186, 188; he proposes to write a series of letters on, 202, 203; one of the points of the High Church, the Evangelical, and the Educational parties, 203; on Dr. Pusey's tract on, 205; and on the nature of the Covenant of, 208; difference betwixt Dr. Pusey's views on, and Maurice's, 213, 214; letter to a Quaker on, 214; Maurice's tract on, 219; breach between Dr. Pusey and Maurice on the subject of, 221, 237; becomes the central point of Maurice's teaching, 236; the essence of Maurice's idea of, 269; best mode of dealing with the objection of Antinomians to infant, 375; on the importance of, ii. 242; on the force of the word "made" in the Church's rite of, 271, et seq.; the witness of a real spiritual fellowship, 275; belongs to the Gospel, but its ground-work in circumcision, 281; the Baptism of the Spirit, 352; on baptism into the Divine Name, 495, 496

"Baptismal Regeneration," difference betwixt Dr. Pusey's views on, and Maurice's, i. 214; general references to, 236, 237; Maurice's views on, wide as the poles asunder from Hare's, ii. 30

Barry, Canon, afterwards Principal of King's College and Bishop of Australia, his account of an incident at one of Maurice's lectures, i. 318; letter to, from Maurice, as to a course of metaphysical and philosophical reading, 463-469

Barton, Anna, Maurice's first acquaintance with, i. 227; her parentage and family, ib.; characteristics of, 229; letters to, from Maurice, 230-233; her character, 234; her marriage, ib. See Maurice, Mrs. F.

Bather, Archdeacon, and catechisms, i. 170

Baxter, Richard, leader of the English Presbyterians, i. 2

Bayley, Mr., an Independent minister and founder of a 'People's College,' ii. 232

Beales, Mr. M. A., of the Reform League, i. 49

Beatrice, a, to bless earth and show heaven, i. 445

Beaumont, Barber, account of his institution at Stepney, ii. 63, 64

Beggars, Maurice a victim to habitual, ii. 287

Belief, Maurice's impression as to a coming crisis in, ii. 182

Belsham joins the Presbyterians, i. 5; is rejected as a preacher for Michael Maurice, 6

Bennett, on the prosecution of, ii. 614

Bentham's 'Book of Fallacies,' Maurice on, i. 66; his 'Principles of Morals and Legislation,' 202

Benthamism, Maurice opposed to, i. 178

Bentley, R., letter from, to Maurice, on the subject of his novel, i. 163

Berkeley, as a metaphysician and as a man, i. 82

Betheridge, Mr. sermon by, on Sabbath-breaking, i. 115

Bezer, J. J., a Chartist publisher, ii. 112; known as Μοροψ, 126, 127

"Bible and Science, the Claims of the," ii. 451

Bible and the Church, on the, i. 333

Bible, on the study of the, i. 372-376; mode of studying the, in the classes held at Queen Square, 488-493; what the, was meant to tell, 511; the, the history of a Deliverer, 517; what Maurice has said, and what he has not said about the, ii. 229; on Greek myths and the, 267; on the Church formularies and the, 272, 273; the, for Mansel, equivalent to the word "Revelation," 328; "The Book of the Wars of the Lord," 347; need of a point of reconciliation between the Jewish and the Western mind to render the, intelligible, 395; on the true use of the, 501; on the reverence of Luther and the Reformers for the, 602; and of the Articles, 603; tendency of the clergy to give to the, the title of the Word of God, ib. and 499

Bible classes at Queen Square, Mr. Mansfield's account of the, i. 488-493; their usefulness to Maurice, ii. 236

Biographies, on cold, impartial. i. 531. See Robertson, Boswell.

Bismarck, references to, ii. 618, 619

Blackwood's Magazine, Maurice's attack

- on, i. 62; enthusiastic review of, 88
- Blair's 'Lectures,' Maurice on, i. 69
- Blomfield, Bishop, and Kingsley's sermon, ii. 79 n.; references to, i. 296, 308, 416, 418, 451; ii. 87, 96, 101, 111, 192, 193, 195, 198, 200, 201, 202, 203, 212, 214, 362-363
- 'Book of Trades,' the, i. 18
- Books, read those of great men, not digests, i. 469
- Borough, the, Maurice's desire for the improvement of, i. 415
- Boswell, his merit as a biographer, ii. 410
- Boyle lecturer, Maurice appointed, i. 416; reference to, ii. 230
- 'Bradfoot, Thomas, Schoolmaster, the Experiences of,' ii. 55
- "Brazen Serpent," influence on Maurice of Mr. Erskine's work on the, i. 108
- Breakfasts, Maurice's habit of giving, ii. 284
- Brentano's, Herr, recollections of Maurice, ii. 2, 3; his history of the co-operative movement in England, 3 n., 162
- Brewer, Dr., of King's College, i. 539; ii. 10; his speech at the farewell meeting at the Working Men's College, 550; reference to, 633
- Bribery at elections, Maurice's suggestions for diminishing, ii. 520
- Bright, John, Rt. Hon., ii. 25, 460, 499
- British and Foreign School Society, account of a meeting of, by Maurice, when a boy, i. 35, 36
- British Museum, a visit to, i. 543
- Broad Church, account of the origin of the name, ii. 607 n.
- Broad Churchmen, Maurice's view of, i. 183, 184; does not know well what they are, ii. 359; Mr. Leslie Stephen's statement of the views of, and the controversy it provokes, 599 et seq.; letter of a, in the Spectator on Maurice's view of the Articles, 604
- Brooke, Rev. Stopford, his 'Life of Robertson,' ii. 508, 509, 512-516
- Brodie, Sir Benjamin, his version of what took place at the meeting of the Council of King's College, ii. 197-199; letter to, 199; his letter to Archdeacon Hare, 204
- Brougham, Lord, i. 39, 78, 427
- Bruce, Lady Augusta, calls on Maurice, ii. 436
- Bruce, Mr., afterwards Lord Elgin, becomes Maurice's most intimate college friend at Oxford, i. 108; and directs his attention to Mr. Erskine's works, 108
- Bubbenhall, Maurice becomes curate at, i. 153; his occupations at, 161
- Buckingham, Mr. Silk, starts the Athenæum, i. 78; his personal squabble with the editor of a rival paper, 97
- Buckland, Dean, his opinion of Niebuhr, i. 420
- Buddhism, on the self-worship of, ii. 230
- Bulwer Lytton, at Oxford, i. 162
- Bunsen, Chevalier, account of his labours at Rome, i. 167; an introduction to for Trench, 171; Maurice's estimate of, 286; his opinion of Catholicism, 287; and of Dörner's book on theology, 291; Maurice's pleasure at meeting him, 291; he breakfasts with, 320; references to, 327, 361, 415, 463, 539, 542; his desire to obtain a fitting candidate for the divinity chair at Cambridge, ii. 14; Maurice's estimate of, 251-253; letter to, 257; his illness, 379
- Bunyon, Mr., letter from, to Maurice, ii. 432; and its effect, 433
- Burdett, Sir Francis, i. 16, 39
- Burke, i. 66; the index to all modern thought on politics, 217, 467; Maurice's admiration for the speeches of, at Bristol, ii. 119
- Burnett, Mr., his remarks at International Conference at Paris, ii. 120 n.
- Butler, comparison of his three sermons, i. 467; his 'Analogy' and sermon on the conscience, ii. 510; "revelation" must bear a different meaning from "revealed religion," 511
- Butler, Dr. Montagu, his remarks on Maurice's death, ii. 643
- Byron, Lord, i. 65, 78

C

- CÆSAR'S 'Commentaries' and the Druids, i. 293
- Calamy's 'History of the Ejected Ministers,' i. 6 n.; Maurice's desire to possess a copy of, 37
- Callings of priests and soldiers, on the, ii. 417, 418
- Calvin, on the strength and weakness of, ii. 588, 589
- Calvinism, amongst the English Presbyterians, i. 4; three of Michael Maurice's daughters become strong believers in, 20, 28; peculiarity of Mrs. Maurice's belief in, 29; nature of, 29; the existence of the "elect" the very

- essence of, 29; Maurice terrified by, 43; the keen misty mountain air of, 339; the great misery of, 376; the sovereign of, ii. 16; the greatest witness for the divinity of all principles, 152; on the only mode of reforming Scotch, 317; the proclamation of God as the originator of all faith and righteousness in man, the strength of, 318; the saints of, 606
- Cambridge Preachership at Whitehall, undertaken by Maurice, ii. 635
- Cambridge, University of, Maurice proceeds to, i. 44; defends the system pursued at, 49, 50; his love for, 70; his later opinion of the system of study pursued at, 70; thinks of returning to, 93; A. H. Hallam's report of his early influence at, 109, 110; his early years at, 175; condition on which a degree was to be obtained at, 180; Maurice on the system of subscription at, 181; offered a tutorship at, but declines, 206, 207; election of Lord High Steward for the, 294-297; Maurice looks for hope and comfort to, 322; "Cambridge Tracts," 368, ii. 231; Maurice's recollections of his old friends at, i. 547; the appointment to the Professorship of Divinity at, ii. 14; Maurice's mental training at, 530, 511 n.; his election to the Knightsbridge Professorship of Moral Theology and Moral Philosophy at, 542, 545; accepts the living of St. Edward's, at, 627; his life at, 628-632; his last days at, 635-641
- Campbell, Mr., Maurice helped by the sermons of, i. 183; letter to, from Maurice, ii. 297; references to, 384, 404; his intercourse with Maurice, 537; serious and singular charge he brings against Maurice, 538-541; reference to, 571
- Canaanite wars, the, defence of the, ii. 57, 58
- Candlish, Dr., his attack on Maurice, ii. 237; reply to, 237 n.; Mansel's reference to, 335 n.
- Capital and labour, Maurice's dislike to discussions on, ii. 113-116; human relationships the basis of society, not capital and labour, 113-116
- Cardwell, Mr., Maurice's opinion of, i. 442
- Carlyle, his account of the Athenæum and its early contributors, i. 79; visits Maurice at Guys, 199; antagonism of, to Maurice, 250; Maurice on Sterling's article on, 276; on his 'Chartism' and French Revolution, 278, 279; and on his reputation and power, 280, 281; Sewell, Whewell, and Hare on, 280; Maurice on his lecture on Mahomet, 282; and on the effect of his influence generally, 283; his unrest, 284; remarks on an article on, in the Quarterly, 293, 301; reference to, 339; scene with, at a London dinner party, 346; on the function of, 348; Maurice writes a defence of, in the Christian Remembrancer, where he had been attacked, ib.; why Maurice reads, 352; desire of, to obtain Sterling's papers, 387; starts from the Radical or popular ground in politics, 485; reference to, 504; on a rumour he was about to write a life of Sterling, 548; the beginner of a restoration in history, ii. 277; on Irving, 403; a profound theocratic belief the basis of his mind, 404; Maurice's account of an interview with him, 405; his growl against emancipation, 440
- Catechism, on the language of the, i. 236; Dissenters and the, 432; on the importance of the, ii. 271, 297; on giving up the, 612, 613
- Catechisms, Committee, Maurice on, i. 170
- Catholic Church, on the, i. 306, 307; a Catholic system one of the greatest enemies of the, 308; the nation Protestant with a, 320; the true centre of unity for the, 326
- Catholic faith, the elements of the, ii. 570
- Catholicism versus Popery, i. 187, 321
- Cave of Adullam, Maurice's desire to pass through a, to unite a kingdom, i. 358
- Central Board formed of the working managers of the several associations, ii. 41, 46; Maurice's reasons for declining to join, 42-45
- Centre, the cry for a Personal, i. 348
- Century, on the characteristics of the first half of the present, ii. 59
- Chalmers, Dr. his maxim regarding religion, i. 182
- Charity, universal, the characteristic of a minister of the gospel, i. 158
- Charity, a bottomless pit of, i. 529; the eternal, ii. 416; the infinite, 564; the Fathers and the most orthodox writers treat The as "the name," "the foundation of all human life," ii. 413, 416; see also 494-497;

- confer also "Name," i. 413; and ii. 22, 349, 350.
- Chartism, i. 268; Maurice on, 278; in 1848, 457, 472
- Chartists, Maurice's meetings with, i. 536-539, 542, 544, 549. See working classes.
- Chaucer, his prologue to the 'Canterbury Tales,' Maurice proposes to lecture on, i. 290; his lectures on, 292
- Chelmsford, Lord, ii, 466
- Chevalier, Le, ii, 33; his views on co-operative associations, 45; and as to payment and division of profits, 47; reference to, 549
- Child, on the birth of a, i. 192; on being asked to be godfather to a, 192; on the death of a still-born, 265
- Chrétien, Mr., his view of the controversy between Maurice and Mansel, ii. 340
- Chrétienne, La Fraternité, i. 458
- 'Christ, the Kingdom of,' i. 238, 244, 269, 304, 309, 336, 337-342
- Christ, on the power of His death, i. 106; in us, 154-157; on the second coming of, 208; in us the hope of glory, 230; the centre of human fellowship, 240; as presented in the Gospels, 253; and Epistles, 254, 255; the ground of human fellowship, 257-260; Maurice's habitual mode of referring to the parables and expressions of, 334 n.; the fulfilment of man's highest hopes only to be found in, 349; knowledge of God and C. eternal life, 396-398; ii. 15-23; "is with you and in you" is the Gospel, i. 509; on the love of, 531; on the fulness of the sacrifice of, ii. 22; the Christ of St. Paul the foundation of the universe, 138; the obedience due to, 160; the Head of man, 161; the Bible view of, satisfies conscience and reason, 230; a freemasonry among those who confess, 241; on the full manifestation of, 243 et seq.; on the certainty of the appearing of, 245; the reconciliation of, the one answer to men's schemes, 262; the day of, at hand, 264; the death of, the bond of humanity, 266; preaching, the setting forth of, 330, 331; the infinite and eternal Love seen in, 350; the Anointed of the Spirit, 351; the Deliverer and Head of all nations, 376; on the fulness and perfection of the sacrifice of, 393-395; on the Incarnation of, 406; the race in, not in Adam, 408; delivers from eternal death here, 416; must reveal Himself, not be proved by texts, 445-447; on the character of, as drawn by Renan, 461-463, 465; the revelation of God in the emancipation of nations, 494; the heaven of, 523; Mr. Campbell's strange misconception of Maurice's views of the work of, 537-541; on the sacrifice of, and our mode of accepting it, 555-557; is now the High Priest of Humanity, 559; our duty to own Him, not as special followers of His, but as men, 559; his condition on earth and in heaven, 559, 560; on being in, 560; the blood of, the true life-blood of humanity, 561; the atonement in the Living Word according to St. John and the 2nd Article, 566-569; on the unity of, with the Father, 568; on the faith and trust of, as the root of all social life, 572-574; the Head and Lord of every man, 581; is now, as before He came, the Desire of all nations, 582.
- "Christian Doctrine," on Milton's treatise on, i. 63
- Christian socialism, a series of tracts on, ii. 33-36; origin of the name, 35; attitude assumed towards, by certain political economists, 50; a Parliamentary Committee on, examine witnesses, 52; and issue a report on, 53; report of a Committee of King's College on, 90; Maurice explains what he and his friends meant by, 91-96; Fraser's attack on, 108; Kingsley is urged to reply to, 108; sends his reply to Maurice for approval, 111; the spirit, of the necessary fulfilment of the principle of the Gospel, 128; on the phrase, 549
- Christian Socialist*, first number issued, ii. 55; Mr. Ludlow, editor of, 55; Maurice contributes to, 55; has no intention of becoming editor of the, 88; the title to be changed to Journal of Association, 96; and Mr. Hughes becomes editor, 104; Mr. Ludlow's appeal to the men about to strike, in, 104; no publisher could be found for, 112; a special one appointed, 112, 127; reference to the phrase, 550
- Christianity, Brentano speaks of Maurice as drenched in, ii. 2
- 'Christmas Day, and other Sermons,' i. 332

- Church, on the Universal, i. 166; the Church a Kingdom, 167; a prophetic vision of one, throughout Christendom, 206; unity of the, the subject of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, 211; letters to a Quaker on the nature of a, 212, 245, 258; Neander lacks the idea of a visible, 217, 249; our need of a, 279; National Education should be in the hands of the, 269, 277, 285; Christianity and the, 298, 299; Maurice's responsibility in connection with the, 298, 299; on the Catholic, 306, 307; one of the greatest enemies of the Catholic, 308; the true Centre of Unity for the, 326; on the Bible and the, 333; on the desire for a, of living men, 340; controversy regarding Wood's Ideal of a Christian, 390 et seq.; weighed down by the want of belief of its members in God's Love, 507; difference between Maurice's point of view, and Hare's as to the position of the English, 509; on the power, position, and constitution of the English, 522-524; Maurice's love for the formularies of the English, 522; episcopacy expresses the Catholic character of the English, 524; Maurice's vocation that of a reformer, ii. 7; Communism the principle of the, 8, 9; importance of the principle of the union of the State with the, 8, 9; what is meant by reformation, 8-10; what the sin, the apostasy, of the (members of the), consists in, 272; on the Catechism, 271, 272; on the Bible and the formularies of the, 272-275; of England, what it confesses, 376; what foundation it recognises for all men, 443; approach of a great conflict and crisis in the, 518; what it continually bears witness to, 524; and preaches, 581; on the history and nature of the union between State and, 584-586
- Church of England. See English Church.
- Chrysostom, ii. 109
- 'Church a Family, the,' ii. 53
- 'Church, Reasons for not Joining a Party in the,' i. 238, 304
- Churchmanship, on the form of, set forth by the 'Oxford Tracts,' i. 236
- 'Churchmen, Letters to a Quaker for,' i. 212, 214
- Churchmen, Carlyle's antipathy to, i. 278; furnishes them with a motto, 279; striving of, against the Spirit of Truth and Charity, ii. 518
- 'Cicero de Oratore,' i. 37; political writings, 217; reference to, 225; on the philosophical treatises of, 465, 466; reference to, ii. 541 n.
- Civil Wars, the, Maurice's view of, ii. 276-278
- "Clapham Sect," the, incident in Maurice's career while on his way to a meeting of, i. 186
- Clark, Rev. S., i. 199 and n.; assists in editing the Educational Magazine, 284; assists Maurice with books, 300, 301; letters to, 416, ii. 424; joins the committee of Queen's College, 455; reference to his future Wife, 253 and n.
- Clark, Rev. W. G., Public Orator at Cambridge, ii. 543, 546; reference to, 553; his pamphlet assigning reasons for abandoning his orders, 602; Maurice's reply to, 602
- Clarkson, Mr., reads with Maurice for the Bar, i. 42
- Clemens of Alexandria, on the writings of, i. 466; on the study of, ii. 57
- Clergy, self-sacrifice of the parochial, i. 352; responsibility of the, 507, 528; and the good news they have to proclaim, 528; responsibility of the, to give Christian communism a fair trial, ii. 8; what the parochial clergy might do if they would, 61; on the need for reformation in the teaching of the, 316; wherein they differ from other men, 417; Maurice's indignation at a mercenary view of the function of the, 457
- Clerical Journal*, a letter to the, giving a stranger's exposition of Maurice's views on eternal punishment, ii. 368, 369
- Clerical life, specimens of English, i. 351
- Clerical provincial newspaper clubs, i. 243
- Clifton, the associations connected with, i. 234, 266, 540
- Cobbett, Mr., i. 78
- Cockneyism, Maurice's definition of, i. 62
- "Cockneyism, the New School of," i. 62
- Colenso, Bishop, dedicates his sermons to Maurice, ii. 184; his work in Africa, 295-297; 'Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans,' 421; Wilberforce desirous of condemning it, 421; his book on the Pentateuch, 421; his correspondence with Maurice on the subject, 421; and painful meeting with

- him, 422-424; result of this on Maurice, 424-435; reference to, 437; Maurice declines to meet, 485; defends him against the Bishop of Cape-town's prosecution, 486; advises a clergyman how to treat, 487-491; his unbelief about God influencing nations, 510
- Colenso, Mrs., letter to, from Maurice, ii. 295-297
- Coleridge, i. 65; his thoughts on 'Eustace Conway,' 164, 165; influence of his writings on Maurice, 176, 178; his disregard for facts, 203; and eagerness for light, 203; Maurice's opinion of the third volume of his 'Literary Remains,' and of the man himself, 250, 251; not a thorough Platonist, 251; Maurice's opinion of, as a critic, 510; a philosopher and a penitent, ii. 194; his doctrine of inchoate humanity in the animals, 278; on what the Bible and the Church of England bear witness to, 451
- Coleridge, Hartley, and the sermons on the Lord's Prayer, i. 501
- Coleridge, Mr. E., of Eton, Maurice's recommendation of, i. 360
- College, great advantage to be educated at a, i. 223; duty of every Englishman of birth and property to attend a, 223
- Commandments, the Ten, importance of the, ii. 524, 525, 544
- Communism, Christian, ii. 6; the Church Communist, 8, 9
- Communion confession, on the nature of the, i. 526, 527
- Communion, the, for all, ii. 394; the great witness against sectarianism, 595; administration of the, to the revivers at Westminster Abbey, 617
- Competition, or selfishness, not the law of life, ii. 32; on the evils of, 47
- Competitive examinations, on the injurious effects of, ii. 591, 593
- Composition, how to teach, i. 291
- Compton, Rev. J., i. 32; letters to, ii. 143, 213
- Comte, the science millennium of, ii. 59; the only way of meeting the positivism of, 311; the result of his system, 461; the substitution of Dogma for God the characteristic of, and his school, 571
- Comtism, on an article on the Christian aspects of, ii. 578
- Comtists, reference to the, ii. 598, 619
- Consort, the Prince. See Prince Albert.
- Contemporary*, the, an article on Comtism in, ii. 578; reference to, 615, 618
- Conventionalisms, Maurice's hatred of, ii. 478
- Convocation, thoughts on, i. 308
- Conybeare, Mr., recognises the title "Broad Church," as an established party-designation, and defines their tenets, ii. 607 n.
- Cooper, W., the Chartist tailor, effects of Maurice's preaching on, i. 519, 538; reference to, ii. 26; selected to organise the first co-operative association, 40; his evidence on co-operation, 52; his tour through Lancashire, 56; at a tea-meeting, 62; references to, 172, 173
- Co-operation in England, ii. 6; a dinner to decide in promoting workshops on the principle of, 30; organisation of the first association, 40; Maurice's views of the principles which should regulate, 40, 41; reply to certain objections urged against, 46-49; the shadow for the substance of, 106; responsibility of the defenders of, 107; success of the principles of, 156; they obtain legal and royal recognition, 157 and n.; and are now universally prevalent, 162; as applied to trade, has a Christian foundation, 549
- Co-operative societies, early, i. 76
- Corinthians, subject of the first Epistle to the, i. 211
- Cornelius, i. 320
- 'Corpus Liturgicæ,' Bunsen's compilation of a, i. 168
- Council of promoters, for forming co-operative associations, ii. 40; Maurice's labour on the, 56; Kingsley's desire to leave, 59; attack on the, 71-74; labours and difficulties of the, 74-76; consulted by the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, 103; success of their efforts, 156-159; their fight for a fair trial for co-operation finished, 159; henceforth their chief function must be counsel-giving, 159 et seq.; proposed new constitution for, 159; Maurice's objections to, 159-162; meeting of the, to aid in instituting a Working Men's College, 232
- Cousin's 'Nouveaux Fragments Philosophiques,' i. 289
- 'Coward's Castle' (the pulpit), Maurice's dread of taking advantage of, to express his own opinions, ii. 439

Cowper, Rt. Hon. W., afterwards Lord Mount-Temple, ii. 362
 Cox, Rev. W. G., his correspondence with Maurice on the subject of Colenso, ii. 449
 Cranworth, Lord, ii. 466
 Creed of Association, Maurice's, ii. 113-116
 Creed, the Athanasian. See Athanasian Creed.
 Creeds, the three, Maurice's love for, i. 525; the theology of the, against the world, ii. 381.
 Crimean war, on the, and the National Sermons produced by, ii. 240; on the good brought by, 250; on the sufferings of the soldiers in the, 256
 Croker, J. Wilson, his attack on Maurice in the Quarterly Review, ii. 71-74; Lockhart's disgust at, 71 n.
 Cromwell, on the character of, ii. 277
 "Curate's Clerical Club," the, ii. 458
 Cyril, ii. 109

D

DAILY NEWS, attacks of, on Maurice and his associates, ii. 84; defends him against the Council, 210-212; reference to, 563; Maurice contributes a series of letters to, on Church and State, 584-586.
 Darwin, Mr., on the discoveries of, ii. 452; the spirit of his investigations, a lesson and a model for Churchmen, 608
 Dathe, as a book of reference, i. 225
 Davies, Rev. J. Ll., letters to, from Maurice, ii. 269-271, 355, 409; notices Maurice's 'National Morality' in the 'Fortnightly,' 597; reference to, 641
 Day, Mr., who took two girls from the Foundling Hospital to train up one for his wife, i. 498
 Dead, the, have they a knowledge of those who remain behind? ii. 619-626
 Deathbed stories, Maurice's distrust of, ii. 139
 Death, eternal. See Eternal death.
 Death, on the, of a still-born child, i. 265; of a friend, 328; on the remarkable recurrence of, in the Maurice family at the season of Easter, 366; on Sterling's, 378-381; on deep sorrow at, ii. 145; a step in the revelation of Christ, 245; on happiness after, 559; comfort on the death of a sister, 569; on that of a mother, 579; and on that of a child, 587; on recognition after, 587; the bond of communion between heaven and earth, 625
 "Death the true end of death," the phrase supposed to be difficult when used by Maurice, though no one thinks it so in Shakespeare, Milton, and Donne, ii. 533
 Decalogue, on the importance of the, ii. 524, 525, 544
 Deliverer from evil, on trust in the, ii. 555-557
 Democracy, Maurice's views on, ii. 128-132; his dread of, 440; cause of his horror of, 497; on the nature and functions of, 557-559
 De Morgan, Mr., allusions to, i. 469, 471
 Denison, E. B., his letter to Maurice, ii. 196
 Dennison, Archdeacon, his 'Reminiscences,' i. 273; his conduct at a National Society meeting, 546
 Departed, the, have they a knowledge of those who remain behind? ii. 619-626
 De Quincey, i. 65, 88; result of his intellectual acquisitions, 215
 Despondency, on, i. 143, 301
 Development, doctrine of the High Church party on, i. 367; on Newman's theory of, 422-424
 Devil, on the personality of the, ii. 21-23; Maurice knows "in his proper person," 268; on the personality of, and "belief" in the, 402
 D. G., see Grace of God.
 Dialogues, list of, contributed by Maurice to 'Politics for the People,' i. 473
 'Dialogues in the Penny Boats,' i. 472
 'Diary of Mr. Papster,' i. 66
 Dickens's quarrel with his publishers, effects of, ii. 321
 Dictating, curious habit of Maurice's while, ii. 286
 Diderot, i. 63
 Dimsdale, Mr., his desire to be useful, ii. 64
 "Disembodied spirits," on, ii. 623
 Disraeli, Mr., his speech at Oxford, ii. 492 n.; his attack on Maurice, 493 n.; his Bribery Bill, 493 n.; reference to, 507, 520; fulfilment of the 'Vivian Grey' prediction in his premiership, 576
 Dissenters, relations of Elizabeth and Mary Maurice towards, i. 126, 127;

Maurice's feelings about when a boy, 175; his regard for, and desire to conciliate the, 358, 359; his remarks on, and the education question, 432; the Dissenters' Chapels Bill, 434-436; on the revision of the Liturgy to suit the, ii. 357-361; on the means of attracting, to the Church, 563; Maurice's attitude to, on the education question, 610

Divine Spirit, experiences of mankind respecting a, ii. 230

Dogma for God, the substitution of, the tendency of the time, ii. 571

Donatists, Augustine and the, ii. 110, 142

Dorner, his book on theology, i. 291

Doubts and difficulties on religious subjects, how Maurice became acquainted with the prevalent, i. 494, 495; ii. 163, 236; his mode of dealing with, 225, 235

Downing College, Cambridge, a tutorship at, offered to Maurice, i. 206; but declined, 207; proposed improvements to be introduced at, 207

Dunn, Mr., on the death of, i. 252

Dyster, Dr., letter to, from Maurice, ii. 587

E

'EAST END Needlewomen's Workshop,' failure of an attempt to establish, ii. 65

Easter, singular fatality of the season of, to the Maurice family, i. 366; recollections of the sorrows of, 520; Maurice's own death at, ii. 640, 641

Ebden, Mr. his letter to Mr. Kingsley regarding Maurice at Cambridge, i. 72

Ebury, Lord, his Bill regarding the Prayer-Book, ii. 492

'Ecce Homo,' on the work so called, i. 13; ii. 466, 511

Eccleshall, Maurice examined at, i. 159; his recollections of, 481

'Eclectic Review,' attacks of the, on Maurice and his associates, ii. 84

Eclecticism, emasculating nature of, i. 339

Ecclesiastical history, importance of the study of, i. 217; a collection of heads for, 253-255

'Ecclesiastical History, Lectures on,' ii. 237 n.

Edgeworth, Miss, books of hers which were favourites of Maurice's in his childhood, i. 17, 19; his sketch of her, 78

Edinburgh, Maurice's visit to, ii. 251

Edinburgh Review, its attack on co-operation, ii. 53, 59, 60, 84; extract from, on the reversal of Dr. Lushington's judgment by the Privy Council in the cases of Williams and Wilson, 466; references to articles in, by Dean Stanley and Mr. Conybeare, 607 n.

'Education, Lectures on,' i. 270, 274

Education, the first principle of, i. 257; lectures on, 270; the German system of, 274; the principle Maurice pursued in his lectures on, 274; his views on, 277; opposed to State, 277; arrangements of the Melbourne ministry with the National Society as to, 285; Maurice on the scheme of, in 1847, 432-434; and in 1849, 546; his views on secular and denominational, ii. 610-613; a proposal to avoid the difficulty as to sectarian, 612

'Education Question, the, in 1847,' i. 434

Educational Magazine, origin of, i. 273; Maurice becomes joint editor of the, 273; his first article in, 275; Sterling's article in, 277; Maurice becomes sole editor of, 278; his stipend as editor of, 281; conducted by three friends during his absence in Switzerland, 284; is discontinued, 303, 304

"Educational party" (view of), Baptism, i. 203

Edwards's Calvinism, ii. 298.

'Eirenicon,' of Dr. Pusey, on the spirit and scope of the, ii. 517-519

'Elect,' the Calvinistic, i. 29; Mrs. Michael Maurice's desire that her son should become one of the, and sense that she herself was not one, 29; effect of this with his intense admiration for her evidenced in letter to her, 154

Ellis, Mr., of Cambridge, his misconception of Maurice, ii. 537

Eloquence, Maurice's remarkable power of, ii. 3; instances of, 3, 4

Emigration scheme, on Sydney Herbert's, ii. 27-31

'Encyclopædia Metropolitana,' Maurice contributes to, i. 185

Engineering trades, great strike in the, ii. 103; Maurice's sympathy with the men, 104; unwilling to urge immediate co-operation on them, 104-107; his anxiety about their next step, 111

England's part in history, ii. 251

English Church, Maurice tends to find in, the reconciliation of truths for which he is seeking, i. 70-72; only restrained by sense of inability from becoming a clergyman in, 93; returns to Oxford that he may fit himself for orders in, 99; reference to, 103; forwards to Sterling, Hare's letter urging Sterling to take orders in, 104; is baptized as a member of, 122; his sister Elizabeth joins, 28; at first a sectarian Church of England woman, begins to have larger views of it, 126; he tells Elizabeth how he missed the Church-service at Emma's death, 124; goes to prepare for orders in, with Mr. Stevenson, 139; "Protestant" a wrong epithet as applied to, 141; Mrs. M. Maurice's defence of his taking orders in, 145; statement of his own scruples as to taking orders in, 152; feelings at moment of ordination in, 158; answer at ordination, claim for the Catholicity of against Puseyites, 162; the one firm consistent witness for the true constitution of Man as Man, 166; own statement at end of life of "Subscription no Bondage" as prophetic of his position in throughout life, 174; as to his feelings towards, as an undergraduate, 177; a member of as such necessarily hostile to all sectarianism within and without, 182; Newman's, Pusey's, and Maurice's views of, 182; the Witness for a universal redemption, 183; the, as an escape from the necessity of parties, 204; Quakers and others may come to understand nature of, better than Churchmen, 212; the service which is freedom in, 226; enthusiasm for catechism of, 236; the 'Kingdom of Christ' written for, 212, 237; reasons for not joining a party in, 238, etc.; universal fellowship for men as men in Christ asserted by, 258; educational function of, 269, etc.; the Universities, the Councils of, in educational matters, 286; all forms of exclusiveness mar the true philosophy of the, 299; one branch of the true Church, 306; blessing to, of the temporary suppression of Convocation, 308; position of, as uniting point for Christendom, 326; the "Kingdom of Christ" a defence of the Catholicity of the English Church, 336; Maurice exalts powers of the, in contrast with actual doings, 352; Maurice can best serve in subordinate place, 356; hopes to reconcile the discontented with, 358; Hare's belief in his calling to this and success, 361, 362; ii. 183; what is weighing down the, i. 507; distinct from the sects which divide it, 522, 523; divine constitution of, 524; Bishop Lonsdale's statement of M.'s relation to, 529; Manning's power in, 545; vocation to be a reformer in, ii. 7; what reformation required in, 9; Duty required by, 26; wishes men of talent to take orders in, 53; duty to, leads Maurice to devote himself to cause of co-operation, 86, 92, 94; Kingley's devotion to, 94; wistful looks towards among Dissenters, 169; references to as to relation of King's College action, 169-209; confusion between a decree of King's College and, 213, 214; working men on Maurice's influence in behalf of, 222; Lawyers on ditto, 224; has not made members subject to judgments of individuals, 225; the sin of lies in denying its own function, 272; need to assert the authority of, but against trivialities, 297; Maurice can admit corruptions of, because as a church she bears witness to truths her members do not practically carry out, 300; exists to witness that Christ is Head of every man, 317; episcopal constitution of, recognised ultimately as fatherly, 318; in her members always on the point of drifting into mere sectarianism, 324; must either be a witness for the redemption of mankind or be cut off, 357; references to, 369, 370, 372, 374-377, 379, 381, 383, 384, 385, 409; various, 422-435; peopled with clergy of schools that there had been an effort to suppress, 437; men's feeling about, 443; every sect narrower and more cruel than, 444; Sir T. Acland on his work in behalf of, 451; reference to, 471, 486; as to Colenso, 487-491; references, 503-507, 518; on the means of attracting Dissenters to, 563; Prayer-book of, 570; the most earnest unbelief a protest against that to which E. C. has yielded, 578; union of with State, 585; references, 596, 597, 599-607; relation to education, 611-613; final thoughts on, 637-641.

English Review, its hostility to Maurice, i. 504, 521; its article on the 'Saint's Tragedy,' ii. 32; Maurice's defiance of the editor of the, 70

- Ephesians, on the meaning of some chapters in, i. 363; the 3rd chapter explains best the doctrine of the Trinity, ii. 349
- Episcopacy, Maurice's view of, i. 247; loves it as expressing the Catholic character of the English Church, 524; on the attempt to force it down the throats of the Scotch, ii. 277
- Epistle to the Ephesians, St. Paul's one thought throughout the, is the blessing of having the knowledge of God, i. 363; 3rd chapter of the, the most helpful for explaining the doctrine of the Trinity, ii. 349
- Epistle to the Romans, on the, i. 304, 375; contains the most profound exposition of the relation of the Spirit to Christ, ii. 351
- Epistles, Christ as presented in the, i. 254; on the importance of studying the leading idea of any of the, 374.
- Epistles of St. John, The, ii. 310, 311, 452
- 'Equality, a Dialogue between a young Frenchman, a Statesman from America, and an English Mechanic,' i. 472
- Erasmus, i. 217; Sterling compares himself to, 256
- Erastian doctrines, Maurice's dislike to, ii. 584, 585; Dean Stanley declares himself "an Erastian of the Erastians," 601
- "Error, not supporting," in the education question, fallacy implied in the formula demonstrated, i. 433
- Ersine, Mr., of Linlathen, his teaching, i. 43; his regard for arithmetic, 81; influence of his work on the "Brazen Serpent" on Maurice, 108; his earlier impressions of Irving's "miracles," 116; his system and conduct, 121; Maurice helped by his books, 183; letter to, from Maurice, 305; a walk with, 323; Maurice's visit to, at Linlathen, 443; letter to, 452; his way of putting an "all-important question," 453 n.; his regard for Mrs. F. Maurice, 533; Maurice dedicates his 'Prophets and Kings' to, ii. 150; entertains Maurice at Glasgow, 251; letters to, 251, 345; his views on sacrifice, 384; and on the 'Essays and Reviews,' 384; reference to, 404; letters to, 548, 551; death of the sister of, 551; letters to, 562, 572-574, 577; death of, 605
- 'Essays and Reviews,' effect of the publication of, ii. 382; Wilberforce's article on, in the Quarterly, 382, 383; Maurice on, 382; his estimate of, 389; to be met by positive faith, not attempts to prove them "feeble and foolish, 389, 390; on their deficiencies, and on the unbelief of the Quarterly reviewer who denounces them, 390
- Eternal, the "Absolute and Eternal," and media of communication with men, i. 340; the idea of time not applicable to the word, ii. 18; the Articles silent as to a definition of the word, 170; on the difficulty of realising the union of the, with its manifestation in time, 264; the whole controversy with Mansel turns on, 328, 331, 332, 341; on the meaning of the word, 342, 343; the word primarily applies to God, and is distinct from, and opposed to temporal, 370; result of Lushington's decision on the word, 426; what the Athanasian Creed teaches regarding the meaning of the word, 483
- "Eternal Charity," the Trinity regarded as the, by the Fathers and mediæval writers, ii. 416
- Eternal death, what is meant by, ii. 348, 393; the true meaning of, 415, 416; on the nature of, and the duty of warning men to fly from, 476; the moral tendency of Maurice's teaching on, 538
- Eternal death and salvation, Hare's view of Maurice's opinion regarding, ii. 183
- "Eternal life," on the true meaning of, i. 396-398, ii. 17; Dr. Jelf's view of, as synonymous with an endless future state, 179; what it is, 393; on the true orthodox meaning of, 413-416; exposition of the Scriptural meaning of, 471-473; on the eternal and the temporal life, and the glory that appertains to each, 473-477; on the force and meaning of the words, 520-523; the message of, formed Christendom, and was at the root of the Reformation, 522; the moral tendency of Maurice's teaching on, 538
- Eternal punishment, and God's Redemption of mankind, Maurice's exposition of the true meaning of, ii. 15-23; the Articles silent as to a definition of the word "eternal," and a theory of "punishment," 170; Colenso's view of the meaning of, 184, 185; Maurice on, 342; a stranger's

- exposition of Maurice's views on, 368; is now as well as hereafter, 443
- Eternity, what it is, ii. 17, 18; the "subtlety" of distinguishing time from, learnt from St. Paul, Athanasius, and Augustine, 177; time and eternity co-exist here, 219
- 'Eton Montem,' Miss Edgeworth's, i. 19
- 'Ettrick Shepherd,' the, i. 78
- 'Eustace Conway,' Maurice's novel of, i. 90; to bear the title of 'Ellen,' 99; it is finished, 104; publisher decides it is too long, 106; it is recast, 110; receives an offer of 100*l.* for it, 123; its publication, 163; letter from Mr. Bentley on the naming of one of the characters "Captain Marryat," 163; criticism on it, 164; Coleridge's thoughts on, 164, 165
- Evangelicals, position of the at the commencement of the Oxford movement, i. 182, 183; baptism one of the points of the, 203; eager for the Jerusalem bishopric, 320; sermons of the, deficient in reverence and depth, 335; result of the hard, artificial, and feeble theology of the, 423; the, and the education question, 434; the ground of Maurice's difference with the, 450; his honour and reverence for their past work, but dreads tendency, now that they have acquired power to substitute formulæ for their father's faith, ii. 234; the fault of the school of the, 241; their dislike for the title of, 606
- 'Evenings at Home,' i. 16
- Evil, on the existence of, ii. 347
- Examination answers at Ordination, Maurice's, i. 159
- Examinations, on the injurious effects of competitive, ii. 591-593
- Exeter Hall, a speech at, i. 515
- Exodus, Maurice's view of, ii. 449
- Explanatory letters of Maurice's, i. 173 et. seq., 235 et seq.
- F
- FACTS, Maurice's respect for, i. 203; disregard for, a defect in Coleridge, 203; become dearer to Maurice every day, 292; lack of, in his lectures, 313; on the value of legends and, ii. 410, 411
- Faith, the Catholic, elements of the, ii. 570; struggle of against sacerdotal and popular opinions, ii. 570
- Faith, recognizes a substance, does not create it, i. 246; the importance of distinguishing the objects from the exercises of, 307; on the nature of, 341; trust, as the sources of Life, whether national, personal, or other, ii. 572 et seq.; that on which human life is built, 572-574
- Fall, the Incarnation precedent to the, i. 376; on Irving's view of the, ii. 406-408
- Fall, the, and Redemption, comparative extent of, i. 189
- 'Fallacies, Book of,' on Bentham's, i. 66
- Fanshaw, Miss, letter from on the subject of Irving's miracles, i. 116
- Farrar, Canon, his reminiscences of Maurice's lectures and style of lecturing at King's College, i. 311-318
- Favre, Jules, ii. 619
- Fellowship, on the grounds of human, i. 257-260
- Female suffrage, Maurice strongly supports, ii. 598
- Festivals, on, i. 303
- Feuerbach, on the function of such men as, i. 349
- Fichte, i. 467
- Flesh and the Spirit, on the battle between the, i. 260-262
- "Form," what Maurice included under the name of, as applied to his thoughts, i. 86
- Formularies of English Church must be interpreted by the Bible, not, vice versa, ii. 273
- 'Formula concordiae,' Bishop of Oxford's, fate of, ii. 201
- 'Fortnightly,' the, notice of 'National Morality' in, ii. 598
- Foster, Mr., the essayist, i. 28, 49, 121
- Fourier's system, Maurice's desire for a knowledge of, i. 334
- Fox, Mr., i. 35
- Fox, Miss A. M., letters to, from Maurice, i. 379, 404, 405, 408, 419
- Fox, Miss C., letters to, i. 404, 453; extract from the 'Journal' of, ii. 62; her account of the letters from inquiring working men which reached Maurice, 163
- France and Germany, on the war between, ii. 618, 619
- Fraser's Magazine*, its attack on the Christian Socialists, ii. 108; Kingsley advised to reply to, 108; Leslie Stephen's article in, on "Broad Churchmen," 599 et seq.
- Fraternity, extracts from an article on, i. 473
- Freemasonry, on a true Christian, ii. 241

- Frenchay, the village of, and its surroundings, i. 10, 33
 'French Revolution, History of the,' Maurice on Carlyle's, i. 279
 Friends, Maurice's, first meetings of, i. 481; they begin their work, 482; others join them, 483
 'Froissart,' a new edition of, i. 300
 Froude, his 'Nemesis of Faith,' Maurice on, i. 516-518; Ludlow's article on, 539; Maurice's desire to sympathise with, 539; on his character as a historian, ii. 280; an imaginary review of, 322, 323
 Furnival, Mr. F. J., letter to, from Maurice, i. 550
 Future state, on the occupations and nature of a, ii. 242-249; and the recognition of friends in a, 246, 587; what it should be connected with, 248; on the possibility of sorrow in a, 523
 Fry, Mrs., allusion to the death of, i. 420

G

- GARDEN, Rev. F. (afterwards Sub-dean of the Chapels Royal), letter to, from Maurice, on the death of his wife, ii. 145
 Gaskell, Mrs., the authoress of 'Mary Barton,' i. 540; ii. 576
 'Gatton's Birds,' i. 18
 Gavazzi, ii. 264
 Genesis, Maurice's view of, ii. 449
 Genoa, demonstration in the cathedral of, ii. 463
 German thought, on the relation between English and, i. 468; ii. 252-254, 257-258
 Germany, influence of Schleiermacher in, i. 453; on the state of, 462; feeling of the Bunsens on the state of, 442; on the war between France and, ii. 618, 619
 "Girls' Home," at Vere Street, opening of the, ii. 555
 Gladstone, Rt. Hon. W. E., his recollections of Maurice while at Oxford, i. 108, 109; the society founded by, at Oxford, 179; Maurice on, 257; at King's College, 283; his "Church Principles," 302; his Aristotelianism, 302; Maurice writes to, regarding Mr. Coleridge of Eton, 360; reference to, 401; his candidature for Oxford, 434; helps in passing the Dissenters' Chapels Bill, 435, 436; Maurice on his candidature for the University of Oxford, 436-443; his amendment in favour of Maurice at the meeting of the Council of King's College, ii. 192; his letter to Lord Lyttelton, giving his account of the meeting, 194-196; and to Sir B. Brodie on the same subject, condemning the precipitate conclusion come to, 199; signs the address to Maurice, 372; opposes Disraeli's Bribery Bill, 493 n.; his defeat at Oxford, 499; allusion to his opposition to the Bribery Bill, 520; reference to, 557
 Gladstone, Miss, Elizabeth Maurice becomes companion to, i. 108, 126
 Gloucester and Bristol, the Bishop of, ii. 584
 God, on the character of, i. 94, 95; the manifestation of, in the Son, the fulfilment of the desire for communion with, 132-137; Protestantism a national recognition of the Kingship of, 140-142; seeks us, not we Him, 218, 219; the blessing of the creature is to have the knowledge of, 363; what the people want is a knowledge of the Living, 369; nearness to, Heaven, ignorance of, or separation from, hell, 384; Maurice's belief in the doctrine of kings reigning by the grace of, 485; and of their being punished for failing to acknowledge Him in their acts, 485, 486; the evil of the time lies in refusing to acknowledge, 508; all life of men in, 514; on the power of the love of, 528; and the resistance in our wills to it, 529; on the belief that we are prepared by, 544; on the Redemption of mankind by, ii. 15-23; the root from which all things are derived, 136, 137; has revealed in Christ His absolute love, 152; God all in all, the maxim of all Maurice's books, 151-153; love of, for all mankind, 152, 153; misconception of Maurice's view that God is naturally the Father of all human beings, 409; Parmenides's, Spinoza's and Hegel's conception of a, 441; the real issue is between trust in a present living, and Atheism, 444; has He made Himself known, 445, 447; the simple lesson taught the child—"God is near you, and will hear your cry"—is the lesson for all, 447; on the duty of proclaiming God as the deliverer, and not the enslaver, of nations, 501; in politics, 509; revelation the discovery of, to a creature formed to know Him, 511; the substitution of Dogma for, leads to Atheism, 571; Christ's trust in, the sign and witness of His divine nature, 572; guiding this age and all in it, 574; on Calvin's faith and want of faith in, 589

Goderich, Lord (afterwards Lord Ripon), his pamphlet on 'The Duty of the Age,' ii. 125-130

Goethe, i. 63; ii. 59, 266

Goodeve, Dr., of Clifton, his letter describing the boyhood of Maurice, i. 38-41

Gospel, the everlasting, to the nations, ii. 354; Mrs. M. Maurice's use of expression, i. 30; ii. 531

'Gospel of St. John, The,' ii. 302, 452

'Gospel of St. Luke, The,' ii. 452

Gospels, Christ as presented in the, i. 253; they cannot be read but as the revelation of Him as the Light of all mankind, 510

Goulburn, Mr. (afterwards Dean of Norwich), Maurice's opinion of, i. 275

Governesses' Benevolent Institution, Maurice's interest in the, i. 455

Grace, a, before Shakespeare and Milton, ii. 397

Grace of God, on kings reigning by the, i. 485; and being punished for failing to acknowledge Him in their acts, 485, 486; ii. 129, 406, 497

Greek myths and the Bible, on, ii. 267

Greene, Mr., the editor of some of Coleridge's works, ii. 194

Greg, Mr., his attack on 'Yeast,' ii. 59, 60, 84

Grey, Lord, i. 180

Grote, the historian, ii. 276; the word "myth" his supernatural element, 454

Grotius, on the study of, ii. 39

Guardian, its attack on Kingsley, ii. 80; and on the King's College Council, 211 and n.

Guizot, on his lives of Louis XI. and Calvin, ii. 588

Guyon, Madame, Maurice's respect for, i. 203

Guy's Hospital, attempt to obtain the chaplaincy of, for Maurice, i. 185; the site of, 186 n.; Maurice becomes chaplain at, 188; expresses his satisfaction with his position there, 193; his every-day life at, 198 et seq.; how he obtained the chaplaincy at, 235; leaves, 422, 426

H

HACKNEY COLLEGE, Michael Maurice at, i. 7

Hallam, Arthur (the A. H. H. of 'In Memoriam'), letter from, to Gladstone regarding Maurice, i. 109, 110

Hallam (the historian), his impartiality, ii. 276

Hall, Robert, the Baptist, i. 47, 121, 123; anecdote of, concerning his "belief" in the devil, ii. 403

Hamilton, Mr. of St. Ernan's, Maurice's opinion of, i. 527

Hamilton, Sir William, ii. 251, 498

Hampden, Dr., the divinity chair, and Dr. Newman, i. 191; Maurice's views on the Bishopric controversy, i. 446, 453

Hampden, importance of the trial and condemnation of, ii. 107

Handwriting, the character of Maurice's, i. 202

Hardcastle, Alfred, i. 16

Harding, Mr., offers Maurice the curacy of Bubbenhall, i. 153

Hare, Augustus, i. 213; ii. 278

Hare, Mrs. Augustus, letters to, i. 417; ii. 259, 278; references to, i. 191, 228

Hare, Francis, i. 97

Hare, Julius, account of Maurice's first acquaintance with, i. 48; his remark on Maurice's metaphysical powers, 52; his powers as a teacher, 52; his exposition of Sophocles and Plato, 52-54; permanent effect of his teaching on Maurice's character, 55; object of his teaching, 56; extract from review of his 'Guesses at Truth,' 84; review of his sermon on the 'Children of Light,' 88; letters to, from Maurice, 96, 99; he advises Maurice to return to Cambridge, 100; and hopes that Sterling will enter the Church, 101; letter to, 102; his estimate of Maurice and of 'Subscription no Bondage,' 190; letters to, from Maurice, 191, 213, 228; amused at Maurice's finding the Catholic spirit in "you," 249; defends Neander, 249; his opinion of Carlyle, 280; D. Macmillan's letters to, 288, 329; urges Maurice to become a candidate for the Principalship of King's College, 354; letters to, from Maurice declining, 354, 357; defence and reply of, 360; letters to, 362, 367; marries Esther Maurice, 385; sends Maurice a reminiscence of it, 386; letters to, 386, 393-395, 398, 410, 417, 419, 420, 451; his life of Sterling, 452; desires to co-operate in issuing a series of tracts for the people, 461; letter to, on the subject, 463; reply to his comments on Kingsley and Ludlow, 476; attacks on his 'Life of Sterling,' 504; his letter to the writer of an article in the English Review, 504; on the difference between Maurice's view of the position of the English Church and Hare's, 509; remarks on his life of Sterling, 548; his desire to stand for the Divinity Chair at Cambridge, ii. 14; difference from Maurice on the Baptismal question, ii. 30; letters to, from Maurice, 56, 66, 86-88, 96, 174, 175; his view of Maurice's dispute with the King's College authorities, 182-184; letters to, from Maurice, 186, 192-194, 202; and from Sir B. Brodie, 204; his death, 255; on the character of, 255, 256, 257; the translator of Niebhur and the defender of Luther, 257; reference to his sermon on sacrifice, 637; Maurice's introduction to charges of, giving sketches of the characters of both him and his brother Augustus.

Hare, Miss Georgina, letters to, from Mrs. F. Maurice, i. 270, 283; and from Mr. Maurice, 422-425, 444, 449, 462, 481, 497, 498-500, 500, 502, 504, 507-509, 513-516, 519, 520, 525-529, 530-539, 540-542; her parentage, 541 n.; letters to, 542-550; becomes the second wife of Maurice, 552. See Maurice, Mrs. F.

Hare, Mrs. F., i. 97

Hare, Mrs. Julius, Letter to, ii. 242-249

Harrison, Mr. i. 161, 162, 170; aids Maurice in obtaining the chaplaincy at Guy's, 235; ii. 87, 102, 193, 197

Harrison, Mr., Treasurer of Guy's Hospital, i. 199, 285

Health league, Maurice opposed to the formation of a, ii. 23-27

Heath, the Rev. Mr., Dr. Lushington's judgment on, ii. 398, 409

Heaven, the, we have to seek, i. 364, and the hell to fly from, 364; on the possibility of sorrow in, ii. 523; the heaven of Christ, 523; the kind of, to think of, 525; on the Kingdom of, 575; on recognition in, 587

Hebrews, on the Epistle to the, i. 419, 424; Maurice's work on, 432

Hegel, on the writings of, i. 465, 467; on his conception of a God, ii. 441

Hell, the, we have to fly from, i. 364; and the Heaven to seek, 364; the Christian idea of, 384; Maurice on, ii. 564

Helvetius's 'De l'Homme,' character of, i. 467

Henry VIII., nature of the "sacrilege" of which he was guilty, ii. 585

Herald, Morning, newspaper, the, and its attacks on Maurice, i. 516, 521

Herbert, Sidney, his emigration scheme, ii. 27-31

Hercules, the choice of, the true one, ii. 312

Heresies, on popular, ii. 571

High Churchmen, answer to Dr. Jelf as to, i. 522-524

High Church party, commencement of the, i. 160; Mr. Maurice on the, 161-163; his account of the rise of, 180; reaction against the principles of the, 185 et seq.; three parts Papist and one Protestant, 187; Baptism, one of the points of the, 203; on the spirit of the, 205; too much mere witnesses against Evangelicals and Rationalists, 206; ignore the use of the Reformation, 206; while they uphold the authority of the Church, would have the world continue in childhood, 206; importance given to the, by Dr. Pusey's joining them, 213, 214; Dr. Pusey's Tracts on Baptism the true representative note of the, as a party, 213; the error of the—opposing to the present age the spirit of a former, 225; the Church and the, 226; on the form of Churchmanship set forth by the, 236; Tract XC. and the protest of the four Tutors, 238; opposed to the Jerusalem bishopric, 320; "reserve" in the sermons of the, 335; the representative of the social faith of the upper classes, 343; Maurice's prophecy regarding the result of the condemnation of the, 344; on the development doctrine of the, 367; result of starting the British Critic to the, ii. 325; their proposed explanation of the Thirty-nine Articles, 517; and of the decrees of the Council of Trent, 517

Highgate Cemetery, Maurice buried at, ii. 642

Hindooism, the priestcraft of, ii. 230

Historical crises, importance of a knowledge of, i. 217

'History of Philosophy in all Ages (Cousin's) Tennemann's, i. 199, 202

- Hobbes, on the 'Leviathan' of, i. 465; shows the relation between speculation and action, 467
- Holidays and festivals, on, i. 303
- Holyoake, Mr., and the Reasoner, ii. 57; references to, 80, 83, 103, n.; warns working men against the Christian socialists, 157; eulogises Dr. Jelf, 211
- Holy Spirit, on the voice of the, i. 138; speaks in and through us, 214; brings all things to our remembrance, 231; within us how acting, 246; distinct Personality of the, 217; on the battle between the flesh and the, 260-262; belief in the, the source of life and action, 324; experiences of mankind respecting a, ii. 230; on the power and office of the, 350; the age of the, 352; the root of all conscious fellowship and self-sacrifice, 463, 641
- Home life and habits of Maurice in middle age, ii. 284-294; as an old man, 628-632; in the sick chamber, 636-641
- Homer, on the study of, i. 217
- Honour, characteristic instances of Maurice's scrupulous sense of, ii. 433, 437
- Hook, Dr., casts in his lot with the High Church party, i. 238; writes to Maurice acknowledging himself wrong, 239; and suppresses the pamphlet in which he had asserted the contrary, 304
- Hooker, i. 217, 225; as a metaphysician and politician, 467
- Hope, view of sin as an enemy, necessary to, i. 143; on the blessings of, ii. 243
- Horace's 'Odes,' i. 37
- Hort, Mr. F. J. A., Maurice's letter to, on Eternal Punishment, and God's Redemption of mankind, ii. 15-23; and on a course of philosophical reading, 37-39; letters to, from Maurice, 60, 61, 597, 612
- Hospital tracts, on, i. 368
- Howell, Mr., i. 107
- Hoxton Academy, most of the professors of, under the influence of Unitarianism, i. 7
- Hughes, Mr. T., his reminiscences of Maurice's services at Lincoln's Inn, i. 427-429; mistake of, with regard to Kingsley and Maurice, 472; first acquaintance of, with Maurice, 483; takes part in the Chartist meetings, 539; and in the endeavour to reclaim ragged boys, 549; his vigorous loyalty, ii. 10; his evidence on co-operation, 52; his tour through Lancashire, 56; becomes joint trustee of a trading company, 75; references to, 111, 112; his account of Lord Goderich's pamphlet on 'The Duty of the Age,' 126; his present connection with co-operation, 157, n.; on Maurice's resignations, 172; references to, 173, 232, 320, 321; proposal for his becoming editor of a new magazine, 321-324; letters to, 330, 334-386; his sympathy with the Republican party in the American Civil War, 438; letter to, 439; his election for Lambeth, 501; his speech at the farewell meeting to Maurice at the Working Men's College, 550; reference to, 633
- Human fellowship, on the grounds of, i. 257-260
- Humanists of the 15th century, on the, i. 467
- Humanitarian Christianity, result of a, ii. 461
- Humanitarians will try to throw off Christianity, ii. 461
- Humanity, an object of worship, ii. 582
- Hume, David, his remark to Adam Smith, i. 480
- Hume, Joseph, i. 39
- Humility, view of sin as an enemy necessary to, i. 143; on, 221, 291, 292
- Hurry, Annie, i. 16; change in her religious views, 20; her estrangement from, and reconciliation with, Mr Hardcastle, 20; her marriage, 22; and death, 23
- Hurry, Edmund, his death causes a remarkable change of opinions among the Maurices, i. 11, 22
- Hurry, Edward C., i. 8
- Hurry, William, i. 16
- Hurstmonceux, on the associations connected with, i. 228, 417, 406-409, 541; ii. 255, 279
- Hullah, Mr., ii. 63, 64
- Husband and wife, on the relations of, i. 498
- Hutton, Mr., letters to, from Maurice, ii. 324-326, 400, 402, 406-409, 436, 441, 453, 454, 458, 461, 465; on a striking expression of, 533; reference to, 605
- Huxley, Mr., on the discoveries of, ii. 452; tone adopted by, towards all thought but his own, 608

I

- IDENTITY, on the difficulty of realising one's own, i. 541
- Impressions, the desire for intenser, i. 245, 500
- Incarnation, in God's purpose, before the Fall, i. 376; on the Hindoo conception of the, 384; the revelation of God, ii. 328; impressions from Irving's view of the, 406-407
- Indian Mutiny, the, thoughts on, ii. 312, 313; cold and formal prayers for, 314; Delhi and Lucknow, 315
- Inglis, Sir Robert, i. 283; Maurice's opinion of, 442; references to, ii. 187, 200
- Infallibility of the Scriptures, view of Luther and the Reformers as to the, ii. 602; why no dogma appears in the Articles as to the, 602; how the Articles regard the, 603
- Inquirer*, attacks of the, on the Christian socialists, ii. 108 and n.; eulogises Dr. Jelf, 211; Maurice on the, 299
- Inspiration, Maurice's view of, ii. 401, 500, 501
- International Trade Conference at Paris, Oct. 1833, ii. 120, n.
- Irving, Edward, Maurice's account of his preaching, i. 107; his "miracles" discussed, 116, et seq.; Maurice's views on the subject, 118-120; Mrs. Oliphant's life of, ii. 403; his knowledge of the old Puritan theocracy, 403; his character as a theologian, 405; his view of the Incarnation and Fall, 406, 407; a phrase of, 530; i. 107
- Irish Established Church, Maurice's conviction that it was doomed, ii. 576; cause of its failure, 586
- Iron trades, great strike in the, ii. 103
- Isaiah, on the direct contradiction between current preaching and, ii. 395

J

- JACOBSON, Dr., i. 99; letter from, to Maurice regarding his return to Oxford, 111; another on the same subject, 113; acts as sponsor for Maurice, 123; sends Colborn's offer to Maurice, 123; his account of Maurice's reception of the class-list, 131; Maurice on the kindness of, 179; his desire to serve under him, 356

- Jebb, Mr., result of his intellectual studies, i. 215
- Jeffrey, Francis, i. 63, 78
- Jelf, Dr., appointed Principal of King's College, i. 363; his special qualifications for the position, 363; his first letter to Maurice regarding his supporting the Jews and Dr. Hampden, 451; his perplexities regarding Maurice, 521; his second letter to him, 521; his letter to Maurice on his connection with Christian socialism and with Kingsley, ii. 78-80; he intimates to Maurice that a Committee of Inquiry is appointed, 86; and conveys to him the report of the Committee, 90; requests further concessions from Maurice, 98; alarmed by the attacks of the party organs on Maurice, 164; writes to the Record that he is examining his 'Theological Essays,' 164; his sensitiveness about his orthodoxy on the Arian question, 171; his view of "eternal life" synonymous with an endless future state, 179; the real issue between Maurice and, 180; Hare's view of the case as against, 182-184; his letter to the Council, 188; his interview with Maurice at the meeting of the Council, 190, 191, 193; his suppression of certain documents favourable to Maurice, 200-202 and n.; his letter to the Council on the subject of Maurice's immediate dismissal, 204; his connection with the Record and repudiation of it, 211 n.; fails to see the issue raised by Maurice, 332
- Jerusalem bishopric, the, Maurice's views on, i. 319, 320; acquiesces in the terms of settlement, 327; effects of his support of the, 521
- "Jerusalem Bishopric Question," Pamphlet on the, 325, 327
- Jewish law, history, and prophets, hints as to the study of, i. 217, 225
- Jewish mind, on the, and the Western, ii. 395
- Jones, Ernest, his crusade against co-operation, ii. 157; his imprisonment and unfair treatment, 157 n.
- Jones, Lloyd, ii. 232
- Journalism, on anonymous writing in, ii. 321-324; on the "I" and the "We" as symbols of unity and sectarianism in, 324-326
- Jowett, Mr., why Maurice does not proclaim his difference from, ii. 367; dispute regarding his salary at Oxford, 400; Maurice's view of, 400;

on a conversation with, 410; reference to, 437; his prosecution by Dr. Pusey, 442; and Maurice's defence of, 442; the Oxford Convocation again refuse to pay him his salary, 468

Justification, on the nature of, i. 262, 263

Juvenal, characteristics of, ii. 448

K

KANT, his great merit, ii. 598

Kearsey, Mr., his conversation with Maurice, i. 71

Keats, i. 65

Keble, Mr., preaches at Oxford, i. 118; his sermon on "National Apostasy," the overt commencement of the Oxford movement, 160; references to, 162, 468

Kempe, Mr., meetings of the clergy at the rectory of, ii. 456; scene at one of them, 457, 458

Kennedy, Benjamin Hall, of Trinity, i. 49

King, Mr. H. S., the publisher, sends Maurice Robertson's 'Life and Letters,' 508; proposes to expose the writers in the Record who have unfairly attacked it, 512; is persuaded by Maurice to forego this purpose, 512-514

'Kingdom of Christ,' the, i. 167, and confer 148-151, 238, 244, 253, 254, 269, 304, 309; circumstances of Maurice's life giving special value to, 336, 337; long letter on, 337-342

Kingdom of God, many waiting for it, i. 540

Kingdom of Heaven, on the, ii. 575

'King John,' remarks on, i. 290

King's College, Maurice elected Professor of English Literature and Modern History in, i. 283; his lectures at, on Chaucer, 290, 292; on the English Nation and its Literature, 293; on Chaucer and on Britain, 299-301; allusion to his lectures at, 310; reminiscences of his lectures at, 312-318; he declines to become a candidate for the Principalship of, 354-360; Dr. Jelf appointed Principal of, 363; Maurice appointed Professor of Theology at, 421; on the theological appointment at, 425; Kingsley proposed as assistant lecturer at, 460; rejected by the authorities of, 478; Maurice's feeling of insecurity as to his position at, 503; his reply to the letter of the Principal of, 521-525; effusion of annual humbug at, 550; the constitution of, ii. 77; "only three links between Tom Paine and," 80; a Committee of Inquiry of, appointed, 86; report of the Committee of, 90; resolutions of the Council of, 100; extract from the Minutes of the Council of, relative to Maurice's dismissal, 188, 190-192; Maurice's own account of the meeting of the Council of, 192-194; Gladstone's and Sir B. Brodie's account, 194-196, 197-199; conduct of the Principal and the Secretary of, in reference to certain letters bearing on Maurice's case, 200; motives of the leading members of the majority in precipitating a decision, 200, 201; suppression of the "formula concordiæ" at, 201; extracts from the Minutes of the Council of, regarding Maurice's dismissal; 204-206

Kingsdown, Lord, ii. 466

Kingsley, C., i. 69; Mr. Ebdon's letter to, 71; his collection of Maurice's pamphlets, 173; extract from a letter to, 346; letters to, from Maurice, 371-377, 445; requests Maurice to write a preface for the 'Saints' Tragedy,' 443; correspondence with Maurice on the subject, 446-449; joins the committee of Queen's College, 455; proposed as assistant lecturer at King's College, 460; and unites with Maurice in endeavouring to stay the mischief of the time, 460; letter to, on the subject, 463; as to his contributions under the signature of Parson Lot, 475-480; King's College authorities reject him as assistant to Maurice, 478; letters to, 496, 516, 532, 538; Maurice on his function in life, ii. 27; letter to, regarding competition, and on a review of his 'Saints' Tragedy,' 31-33; the Record's attack on 'Alton Locke,' 54; his resignation of his position at Queen's College, 54; the Eclectic on 'Alton Locke,' 57; his desire to know the best mode of studying the Alexandrian Schools, for his 'Hypatia,' 56; he replies to Holyoake's attacks in the Reasoner 57; his defence of the Canaanite wars, 57, 58; his 'Yeast,' 58; letters to, from Maurice, 58, 59; his estimate of Maurice's character, 68; Dr. Jelf's censure of, 79, 80; fate of his sermon, 79 and n.; Maurice's defence of, 81; contributes 'Hypatia' to Fraser, 108; his reply to an attack on Christian socialism, 108, 111; under the title of "Who are the Friends of Order?" 112; letters to, from Maurice regarding 'Phaethon,' 123, 124; literary criticisms on, 132-136; letters to, from Maurice, 139-143, 166, 167-169, 170, 231, 239, 249, 250, 255; a series of letters to, on various doubts and difficulties, 260, 263, 265, 267, 271, 275; on his 'Heroes' and 'Sermons,' 275; letters to, 279, 294, 301, 321-324, 449; his dispute with Newman, 479; his 'Teutons and Romans,' 479; letters to, 493, 498, 503-507, 543; exerts himself to secure Maurice's election at Cambridge, 543-545; on the "beauty" of Maurice, 554

Kings reigning by the grace of God, Maurice's belief in the doctrine of, i. 485; and God's wrath manifested against those kings who deny Him, 485; great only in so far as they have looked on themselves as servants of God, ii. 497

Knight, Charles, and his magazine, i. 460

Knox, Alexander, Mr. Maurice's opinion of, i. 171; compare Keble on, 172; result of his intellectual studies, 215; reference to, ii. 451

Knox, John, his treatise on predestination, Maurice's opinion of, ii. 298

Kotzebue, i. 63

L

LABOUCHERE, Mr., and co-operation, ii. 119, 120

Labouring classes, condition of the, in 1830, i. 114

Ladies, on the education of young, i. 66-69. See also "Queen's College."

Lake Fever, Lake School, i. 63

Lamb, Charles, i. 88

Lamennais' 'Affaires de Rome,' worth studying, i. 257

Landon, Miss, i. 86

Langely, Mr. J. N. (afterwards D.C.L.), letters to, from Maurice, ii. 88, 310-312, 317, 409, 563

Language, on learning a, i. 225

Laud, Archbishop, on the character of, ii. 276

Law, Maurice's remarks on, i. 203; his answer to Mandeville, Maurice's preface to, i. 377, 381, 382, 386

Lawyers, on, as judges of theological questions, ii. 486, etc., 506

Leader, Kingsley accused of contributing to the, ii. 80; Maurice's denial of the fact, 81

Leamington, Maurice goes to reside at, i. 153

'Learning and Working,' on, ii. 239

Lectionary, the revised, Maurice's remarks on, ii. 637

Lectures on education, i. 270; on Chaucer, 290-292; on the English nation and literature, 293; on Chaucer and on Britain, 299-301; reminiscences of, at King's College, 312-318; on "Learning and Working," ii. 239; in Edinburgh and Glasgow, 250; to ladies, 260

'Lectures to Ladies on Practical Subjects,' ii. 260

Lees, Mr., ii. 56

Legends and facts, on the value of, ii. 410, 411

LETTERS—Vol. i.

Maurice two autobiographical letters of (1866), 12-21

Maurice, Michael, to his daughter Anne, on the change in her religious views (1815), 23

Maurice, Mrs. M., to her husband, on the subject of the change in the religious views of their children (1816), 23-25

Extract from a letter of his to her on the same subject (1821), 26

Extract from the letter of a cousin in Australia, giving her recollections of the childhood of Maurice, 33

Maurice to his sister Mary, giving an account of a meeting of British and Foreign School Society (1815) 35-37

Goodeve, Dr., of Clifton, giving his recollections of the boyhood of Maurice (1872), 38-41

Maurice to his father, on his studies and prospects (1823), 46

Maurice to his mother, on the Cambridge teachers and system (1823), 47-49, 50

Maurice to his sister Priscilla, on her first going to school (1825), 57-59

Mill, John Stuart, extract from a letter of, on Maurice's connection with the Metropolitan Quarterly Magazine, 61

Maurice to his mother, on his college life (1826), 70

Maurice, M., extract from a letter

LETTERS—Vol. i.

- (1827) of, to a friend, regarding Maurice's leaving Cambridge, 72
 Ebdon, Mr., to C. Kingsley, giving his recollections of Maurice at Trinity Hall (1871), 72
 Mill, John Stuart, to C. E. Maurice, on Maurice's connection with the Westminster Review, the London Debating Society, and the Athenæum (1827), 74
 Maurice to his mother, on his literary pursuits and mental state (1828), 91

1829.

- Maurice to his father, on his own reticence; on his views of God's character; on "judge not," 92-96
 Maurice to Julius Hare, on the subject of the Athenæum, 96
 Maurice to Julius Hare, announcing his intention of going to Oxford, 99
 Maurice to Hare, replying to letter advising his return to Cambridge, 102-104

1830

- Maurice, Emma, to Maurice, congratulating him on the completion of his novel, 104
 Maurice to his sister Priscilla, on the power of Christ's death, 106
 Maurice to his sister Priscilla, on the preaching of Edward Irving, 107
 Hallam, A. H., to W. E. Gladstone, giving his impressions of Maurice when at Cambridge, 110
 Jacobson, W., to Maurice, tendering advice and assistance, 111
 Richards, J. L., to Maurice, offering encouragement and assistance, 112
 Jacobson, W., to Maurice, urging him to return to Oxford at once, and announcing Sterling's marriage, &c., 113
 Maurice, Mrs. M., to Maurice, on the condition of the labouring classes, 114
 Maurice, Emma, to Maurice, giving her views of the Irvingite "miracles," 117
 Maurice to his sister Priscilla, on the "miracles," and on "light," 118 1831.

- Maurice to his sister Priscilla, on Mr. Erskine, 121
 Maurice to his sister Elizabeth, on his sister Emma's death, 124

LETTERS—Vol. i.

- Maurice to his father, on the discipline peculiar to the coming age, 125
 Maurice, to his mother, on relationships as an ascending and descending ladder between the human and divine, 128-131 1832.

- Maurice to his father, on communion with God, setting forth the point of his divergence from his father's views, 132
 Maurice to his father, on communion with God, on God's manifestation in Christ, and on the Divine unity in the Holy Spirit, 134-138
 Maurice to his sister Priscilla, on the voice of the Spirit and of Providence, 138
 Maurice to T. Acland, on Protestantism and the Papacy, 140-142
 Maurice to T. Acland, on Hope, Humility, Despondency, View of Sin as an enemy, necessary to Hope and Humility, 143

1833.

- Maurice, Mrs. M., to a Unitarian, as to Maurice's taking orders, 145
 Maurice to his father, on the Ordination Service, 152
 Maurice to his mother, a letter showing the effect on the development of his thought of the contrast between Mrs. Maurice and daughters, as to which, see 28, 29, 154-157 1834.

- Maurice to his father, on the eve of his ordination, 158
 Maurice to T. Acland, on his occupations at Bubbenthal, and on the Oxford movement, 161-163
 Bentley, R., to Maurice, on Captain Marryat's wrath at the use of the name Marryat in 'Eustace Conway,' 163
 Maurice, M., to Maurice, on the subject of his novel, 164
 Sterling, John, to Maurice, conveying Coleridge's thoughts on 'Eustace Conway,' 164, 165
 Maurice to T. Acland, on the Universal Church, 166
 Maurice, to Rev. J. A. Stephenson, on the benefit derived from his instructions, the Church as a Kingdom, and on Bunsen, 167

LETTERS—Vol. i.

Maurice to T. Acland, on 'Subscription no Bondage,' and on Alexander Knox, 169-172

Maurice, autobiographical letter by, giving a retrospect of his life up to 1835 (1870), 173-184

1835.

Maurice to Rev. R. C. Trench, on the chaplaincy at Guy's, and on Popery, Catholicism, and High Churchmen, 186-188

1836.

Maurice to a friend, on the death of a relation, and on the fall and redemption, 188-190

Hare to Maurice, giving Hare's estimate of him and of 'Subscription no Bondage,' 190

Maurice to Hare, on his appointment at Guy's, and on the Hampden controversy and Dr. Newman, 191

Maurice to Trench, on being a god-father, and on Sterling's preaching, 192

Maurice to his mother, on his satisfaction with his position at Guy's, 193

Maurice to E. Strachey, on his own qualifications as a tutor, 194

Maurice to Strachey, on Sterling's illness, 195

Maurice to Strachey, on his (Strachey's) illness, with a proposal to write him a course of letters, 196

Maurice to Strachey, with a proposal for his reading and study, 197

Strachey, E., extracts from letters from, to his aunt Lady Louis, on the teaching, the doings and opinions of Maurice, 202, et seq.

Maurice to T. Acland, on the qualities desirable in a wife, &c., 204

Maurice to Trench, on A. J. Scott, and on Baptism, 208

Maurice to Hare, on his own candidature for the Chair of Political Economy, 209

Maurice to Trench, explaining the object of his 'Letters to a Quaker,' 212 1837.

Maurice to Hare, thanking him for his brother's sermons, and sending him 'Letters to a Quaker,' 213

Maurice to Strachey, on a course of study, 214-218

LETTERS—Vol. i.

Maurice to his mother, 'God seeks us, not we Him,' enclosing a tract on Baptism, 218

Maurice to Strachey, on his own breach with the Oxford party, and on a University education, 222-224

Maurice to Strachey, on the Church and the High Church party, 225

Maurice to Hare, on Sterling, and on his own happiness, 228

Maurice to Miss Barton, on trust, as a duty confirmed by sacraments, and their mutual happiness from different points of view, 230-233

Maurice to Trench, on his own approaching marriage, 233

Maurice, Mrs. M., to Maurice and his wife, on their marriage, 234

Maurice, autobiographical 'Explanatory Letter,' on 'Reasons for not Joining a Party in the Church,' 235-240 1838.

Maurice to Woolcombe, on taking orders under a sense of inadequate feeling, 245

Maurice to Hare, returning thanks for presents, and on "you" and "thou," 248

Hare to Maurice, on his views of "you," and defending Neander, 249

Maurice to Hare, apologising for speaking flippantly of Neander, 249

Maurice to R. C. Trench, on his own increasing differences from Sterling, 250

Strachey, E., to Lady Louis, Maurice's conversations on Carlyle and Coleridge, 250

Maurice to Strachey, on the philosophy of Coleridge, and on his own, &c., 251

Maurice to Trench, on the death of Mr. Dunn, 252

Maurice to Strachey, on the characteristics of the books of the New Testament, 253

1839.

Maurice to his Wife, on their temporary separation, 255-257

Maurice to Trench, on Abeken, Gladstone, and Lammenais, 257

Maurice to Rev. A. J. Scott, on the ground of human fellowship, 257-260

Maurice to Strachey, on the battle

LETTERS—Vol. i.

- between the flesh and the Spirit,
260–262
Maurice to Strachey, on justification,
262
Maurice to Trench, on a stillborn child, 265
Maurice to Strachey, on the same subject, 265
Maurice to Strachey, on the aim of life, 266
Maurice, Mrs. F. D., to Miss Georgiana
Hare, on Maurice's lectures on education, 270
Maurice to Strachey, on the fate of his own work and on self-discipline, 270–273
Maurice to Hare, on the Educational Magazine, 273
Maurice to Hare, on his 'Lectures on Education,' and his contributions to the 'Encyclopædia,' 274
Maurice to Strachey, on prizes, 275
Maurice to Trench, on Sterling's article on Carlyle, 276

1840.

- Maurice to Hare, on Sterling, 279
Maurice to Strachey, on his article for the 'Encyclopædia,' and on Carlyle, 280
Maurice to Strachey, on going to Switzerland, and on standing for a Professorship in King's College, 281
Maurice to his Wife, on Carlyle's lecture on Mahomet, 282, 283
Maurice, Mrs. F. D., to Miss Georgiana
Hare, announcing her husband's election to a Professorship at King's College, 283
Maurice to Strachey, on Nature and on Switzerland, 284
Maurice to S. Clark, on the Government compromise on the education question, 285
Maurice to Trench, on Switzerland,
Bunsen, and Vinet, 286
Maurice to Hare, on Schelling and Cousin as antidotes to Rationalism,
289
Maurice to Hare, on 'King John' and the 'Canterbury Tales,' as subjects for his lectures, 290
Maurice to his Wife, on humility, his lectures, and an article on Carlyle,
291, 292
Maurice to Hare, on the election of the Lord High Steward at Cambridge, 294–297

LETTERS—Vol. i.

- Maurice to a Friend, on life being a struggle between opposing principles, 297
Maurice to his Wife, on his responsibility in connection with the Church, and on the Highest Truth and the faculty of recognising it being universal, 298
Maurice to his Wife, on his lectures,
300
Maurice to a Friend, on despondency,
301
Maurice to Hare, on Manning's appointment as archdeacon, and on Gladstone's work on 'Church Principles,' 302

1841.

- Maurice to Strachey, on holidays and festivals, 303
Maurice to Trench, on the death of Archdeacon Wilberforce's wife, 304
Maurice to Strachey, on the Epistle to the Romans, 304
Maurice to Erskine of Linlathen, answering a letter on the 'Kingdom of Christ,' 305
Maurice to Hare, on Convocation, 308
Maurice to his Wife, on their prosperity, his lecture, and a blessed sense of weakness, 309, 310
Maurice to Strachey, on the ordination of suffering, 311
Farrar, Archdeacon, on Maurice's literature lectures, 312
Maurice to his Wife, on terms of Communion, 321
Maurice to Hare, business meetings with Bunsen, Abeken, Cornelius, on Jerusalem bishopric; Whewell's appointment, 320
Maurice to Trench, on Catholicism v.
Popery, 321
Maurice to Scott, on his lectures on science, 322
Maurice to his Wife, on Scott's lecture on science, and on the Holy Ghost as the source of life and action, 323

1842.

- Maurice to Aubrey de Vere, on a pamphlet on the Jerusalem bishopric,
325
Maurice to his Wife, on the Jerusalem bishopric question, and on the death of a friend, 327, 328
Maurice to Hare, on a series of tracts

LETTERS—Vol. i.

- to be addressed to the working-classes, 330, 331
- Maurice to D. Macmillan, desiring to make his acquaintance, 331
- Maurice to Rev. A. Atwood, on the Bible and the Church, and on intelligible sermons, 332-335
- Maurice to Strachey, on Thirlwall's 'Charge,' 336

1843.

- Maurice to D. Macmillan, conveying his reply to Dr. S. Brown's remarks on the second edition of the 'Kingdom of Christ,' 337-342
- Maurice to Hare, on the attempt to suppress the Tractarians, 342
- Maurice to D. Macmillan, on the cry for a personal centre, function of Rationalists, &c., 347-350
- Maurice to Strachey, giving an account of a visit to the Isle of Wight, 350-352
- Maurice to Hare, mentioning an attack on himself, 353
- Hare to Maurice, suggesting his candidature for the Principalship of King's College, 354
- Maurice to Hare, in reply, urging objections, 354
- Maurice to Hare, urging further objections to his candidature for the Principalship, 357
- Hare to Maurice, defending himself and replying to the objections, 360
- Maurice to Hare, thanking him for his good offices, 362

1844.

- Maurice to his Wife, St. Paul's one thought throughout the 'Ephesians' is the blessing of having the knowledge of God, 363
- Maurice to Strachey, on Miss Martineau's 'Sick Room,' and on Romanism, 364
- Maurice to D. Macmillan, on the fatality of the season of Easter to the Maurices, 366
- Maurice to Trench, thoughts about Sterling, 367
- Maurice to Hare, on Trench's 'Sermon on the Mount,' and on the development doctrine of the High Church party, 367
- Maurice to D. Macmillan, on Cambridge Tracts, or Hospital Tracts, 368

LETTERS—Vol. i.

- Maurice to Rev. C. Kingsley, on the Bible theology, and the best mode of teaching it, &c., 371-377
- Maurice to Scott, on his own introduction to Law's answer to Mandeville, and on Sterling, 377
- Maurice to Miss Fox, on Sterling's death, 379
- Maurice to Trench, on Sterling's death, 380
- Maurice to D. Macmillan, on his edition of Law, 382
- Maurice to his Mother, conveying a letter to a young sceptic, 383
- Maurice to Hare, on Hare's marriage, and on the preface to Law, 386
- Maurice to Strachey, on Sterling's death and Hare's wedding, 387
- Maurice to Rev. A. Stanley, on Ward's book and the proposed new statutes at Oxford, 391
- Maurice to Hare, on Ward's case, 393-395
- Maurice to Stanley, objecting to his form of protest, 395

1845.

- Maurice to Hare, on his (Hare's) view of Ward's case, 398
- Maurice to Stanley, on Ward's case, 401
- Maurice to Strachey, on his wife's illness, 403
- Maurice to Miss Fox, on his wife's illness and death, 404, 405, 408
- Maurice to his sister Priscilla, on his wife's death, 405, 409
- Maurice to his Mother, on the same subject, 406
- Maurice to Trench on the same subject, 407
- Maurice to Hare, on his objections to being a candidate for the Mastership of the Temple, 410
- Maurice to his sister Priscilla, on Whitsuntide, 412
- Maurice to Rev. Mr. Clark, on the Boyle Lectures, 416
- Maurice to Mrs. A. Hare, on the death of Marcus Hare, 417
- Maurice to Hare, on the same subject, 417
- Maurice to his Mother, on his appointment as Warburton Lecturer, 418
- Maurice to his Father and Mother, on the anniversary of their wedding-day, 418
- Maurice to his sister Priscilla, on the

LETTERS—Vol. i.

- subject of his Warburton lecture, 419
 Maurice to Hare, on the anniversary of his (Maurice's) wedding-day, 419
 Maurice to Miss Fox, on being misunderstood, and on having misunderstood. On the death of Mrs. Fry, 419
 Maurice to Hare, on Buckland's opinion of Niebuhr, 420
 Maurice to Trench, on his study of Hindooism, 420

1846.

- Maurice to Miss G. Hare, on leaving Guy's, and on Newman's 'Theory of Development,' 422-425
 Maurice to Trench, on the theological appointments at King's College and the chaplaincy at Lincoln's Inn, 425
 Maurice to Strachey, on his own appointment at King's College and Lincoln's Inn, 426
 Hughes to Ludlow, on Maurice at Lincoln's Inn, 427

1847.

- Maurice to Strachey, on the education scheme of 1847, 432-434
 Maurice to Rev. C. Powles, on Mr. Gladstone's candidature at Oxford, 436-443
 Maurice to his sister Priscilla, on his visit to Linlathen, 443
 Maurice to Miss G. Hare, on his lectures, and on All Saints' Day, 444
 Maurice to Kingsley, on the admission of Jews to Parliament, 445
 Maurice to Kingsley, on the subject of the 'Saint's Tragedy,' 446-449
 Maurice to Miss G. Hare, on the admission of Jews to Parliament, and a review of his 'Kingdom of Christ,' 449 1848.

- Maurice to Hare, on Dr. Jelf's first indication of distrust, 451
 Maurice to Hon. Mrs. Trench, on the death of her child, 451
 Maurice to Erskine, of Linlathen, on Hare's 'Life of Sterling,' the Hampden controversy, &c., 452
 Maurice to Miss Fox, on Schleiermacher, 453, 454
 Maurice to J. M. Ludlow, on Socialism and Atheism, 458-461

LETTERS—Vol. i.

- Maurice to Strachey, defending the 'Saint's Tragedy,' 462
 Maurice to Miss G. Hare, on Germany the King of Prussia, &c., 462
 Maurice to Kingsley, on the first number of 'Politics for the People,' 463
 Maurice to Hare, on the same subject, 463
 Maurice to Barry, on a course of metaphysical and philosophical reading, 463-469
 Maurice to Scott, declining a union between University and Queen's College professors, 469-471
 Maurice to Hare, replying to his complaints regarding Kingsley and Ludlow, 476
 Maurice to Ludlow, explaining the principles on which he desired to conduct 'Politics for the People,' 478
 Maurice to Miss Hare, on visiting Eccleshall from Prees, 481
 Maurice to Ludlow, kings reigning by the grace of God, the starting point of his own political faith, 484
 Mansfield to Ludlow (1854) giving an account of Maurice's Bible classes, 487 1849.

- Maurice to Kingsley, thanking him for kindness received during a visit, 496
 Maurice to Miss Hare, "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." Time, eternity, love, mercies, time in eternity, 497
 Maurice to Miss Hare, on the relations of husband and wife, Trench's preaching, and the work of the session, 498-500
 Maurice to Miss Hare, on ordinations and weddings, and the work he has in hand, 500
 Maurice to Miss Hare, on current work and thoughts, 502
 Maurice to Miss Hare, on Dr. Pusey's spoiling Miss Sellon's enterprise, 504
 Maurice to Miss Hare, on her brother's letter and his own in reply to an attack on the 'Life of Sterling,' and on the Church's responsibility for not declaring God's love, 507
 Maurice to Miss Hare, on Miss Sellon, the evil of refusing to acknowledge God as the author of Good and the Communion Service, 508

LETTERS—Vol. i.

Maurice to Miss Hare, on the difference between Hare's view of the position of the English Church and his own, and on the power of Christ in man, 509

Maurice to Strachey, on Coleridge as a critic, and on the Bible and the Prayer Book, 510-513

Maurice to Miss Hare, on working-class meetings and the Governesses' Institution, 513

Maurice to Miss Hare, the only good in any men is from God. A speech at Exeter Hall, his loss of voice, and the attacks of the Record, 514

Maurice to Miss Hare, on the Sterling Club and the attacks of the press, 516

Maurice to Kingsley, on Froude's 'Nemesis of Faith,' 516

Maurice to Ludlow, on Froude, 519

Maurice to Miss Hare, on Cooper, the Chartist tailor, 519

Maurice to Miss Hare, on Easter sorrows and the power of the word Redemption, 520

Maurice to Dr. Jelf, defending himself from the attacks of party writers, 521-525

Maurice to Miss Hare, on his letter to Dr. Jelf, 525

Maurice to Miss Hare, on the power of words, the communion confession, love, and on Mr. Hamilton, 526

Maurice to Miss Hare, on the responsibility of the clergy and the good news they have to proclaim, 528

Lonsdale, Bishop, to a Friend, on Maurice's letter to Hare, 529

Maurice to Miss Hare, on Praise as an act of will, due to assurance of God's will, 530

Maurice to Ludlow, wishes for the honour of being persecuted but cannot think he has it, 530

Maurice to Miss Hare, on the best kind of biographies, love as necessary to truth, i. 531

Maurice to Miss Hare, on the evil wrought by the Record, 532

Maurice to Kingsley, on the newspaper outcry about the Sterling Club, 532

Maurice to Miss Hare, on Mr. Erskine, Manning, and Wilberforce. Bishop Short on the mode of dealing with slander, 533

Maurice to Miss Hare, on the Sterling

LETTERS—Vol. i.

Club, and on Passion Week, 534-535

Maurice to Miss Hare, on Dr. Tetley and the kindness of medical men, 536

Maurice to Ludlow, on the meetings with the Chartists, 536

Maurice to Miss Hare, on the meetings with Chartists, 536-539

Maurice to Kingsley, on the origin of the Chartist meetings, and on Froude, 538

Maurice to Miss Hare, on a talk with a young clergyman about to become a Romanist, 539

Maurice to Miss Hare, on reform and the Resurrection, 540

Maurice to Miss Hare, on the associations connected with Clifton and Hurstmonceaux, and on identity, 540-542

Maurice to Miss Hare, on German lecture at Queen's College, a magic lantern exhibition, visit to British Museum, and Whit Sunday, 542, 543

Maurice to Miss Hare, on Trinity Sunday, a working-class meeting, and a meeting of the National Society, 544, 545

Maurice to Miss Hare, on the Education Question in 1849, 546; on a meeting with the Chartists, and dinner with the Apostles' Club, 547

Maurice to a Lady, on Carlyle's and Hare's 'Life of Sterling,' 548

Maurice to Miss Hare, on a day in the country with ragged boys, and a meeting at King's College, 548

Maurice to F. J. Furnival, acknowledging the receipt of a wedding present, 550

Maurice to his Mother, on his second marriage day, 525

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

Maurice to Ludlow, on Christian Communism, 6

Maurice to Ludlow, on the work of the State and the Church in reference to Communism, 7-10

An old Pupil of Maurice's to a Professor at King's College, on the attacks of the religious journals on Maurice, 11

Maurice to Hare, on the appointment

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

to the Divinity Chair at Cambridge, 14

Maurice to Mr. F. J. A. Hort, on Eternal Punishment, and God's Redemption of mankind, 15-23

Maurice to Ludlow, opposing the formation of a Health League, 23-27

Maurice to Ludlow, on Sidney Herbert's emigration scheme, 28-30 1850.

Maurice to Kingsley, with new year's greeting, on competition, and the 'Saint's Tragedy,' 31

Maurice to Ludlow, on a series of tracts on Christian Socialism, 33-35

Maurice to D. Macmillan, on the same subject, 35

Maurice to Kingsley, on a Chartist poet, and on co-operation, 36

Maurice to F. J. A. Hort, on a course of philosophical reading, 37-42

Maurice to Ludlow, giving his reasons for declining to become a member of the Co-operative Central Board, 42-45

Maurice to Ludlow, agreeing to act with the original promoters of co-operation, 45

Maurice to Mrs. Rich, A statement of the principles of the Christian Socialists against the hostile political economists, 46-49

Maurice to Kingsley, on men of talent taking orders, 53

Maurice to his Mother, on Queen's College and his connection with Kingsley, 54

Maurice to Hare, on a conference with the Democrats, 56

1851.

Maurice to Kingsley, advising him as to the best mode of studying the Alexandrian Schools, 56

Maurice to Kingsley, on his defence of the Canaanite wars, 58

Maurice to Kingsley, on 'Yeast,' 58

Maurice to Kingsley, on the characteristics of the first half of the present century, 59

Maurice to Kingsley, on his leaving the Council of Promoters, on 'Yeast,' and on Mr. Greg, 59

Maurice to Ludlow, against publishing a certain letter, 60

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

Maurice to Mr. Hort, on restoring the educational efficiency of the parochial system, 60, 61

Maurice to Ludlow, on a Socialist dinner, 62

Maurice to his Wife, on his visit to Hastings, 63

Maurice to Ludlow, on Beaumont's Institution at Stepney, 63-64

Maurice to Ludlow, on a project he had in hand, 65

Maurice to his Mother, on his visit to Ulleswater, 65

Maurice to Hare, on the same subject, 66

Maurice to his Father, on his plans for returning home, and on his sermons on the Old Testament, 66

Maurice to Ludlow, on the principle of association and brotherhood, 76

Jelf to Maurice, on his connection with Christian Socialism and with Kingsley, 78-80

Maurice to Jelf, defending himself and Mr. Kingsley, 80-82

Jelf to Maurice, acknowledging the satisfactory nature of his defence, and intimating his intention to submit it to the Council, 82

Maurice to Jelf, defending the doctrines taught the working men, showing the injustice of the attacks on them, and referring to supporters, 83-86

Jelf to Maurice, intimating that a committee of inquiry had been named in his case, 86

Maurice to Hare, on the King's College committee, and the expectations of its decision, 86-88

Maurice to Hare, on his becoming editor of the Christian Socialist, and similar publications, 88

Maurice to Mr. J. N. Langley, in answer to Mr. Langley's account of the help F. D. M. had given him, and on Unitarianism, 88

Jelf to Maurice, conveying the report of the committee of inquiry, 90

Maurice to Jelf, in reply, explaining what he and his friends meant by "Christian Socialism," 91-96

Maurice to Hare, giving an account of his interview with Dr. Jelf, 96

Maurice to his Father, a New Year's Day letter, 97

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

1852.

- Jelf to Maurice, requiring additional verbal concessions to public opinion, 98
- Maurice to Jelf, refusing to make further verbal concessions, 99
- Secretary of King's College to Maurice, inclosing the resolutions of the Council, 100
- Maurice to Ludlow, on his appeal to working men of the iron trades, 104
- Maurice to Ludlow, on their duty in connection with co-operation, 105
- Maurice to Ludlow, on the amalgamated iron-trades' strike, 106
- Maurice to Kingsley, urging him to reply to an attack on Christian Socialism in Fraser, 108
- Maurice to Kingsley, on the study of Augustine, 109-111
- Maurice to Kingsley, on the subject of his reply to Fraser, 111
- Maurice to Ludlow, giving an exposition of his creed on association, 113-116
- Maurice to C. Mansfield, on his leaving England, 117
- Maurice to Ludlow, on the subject of a charter for Queen's College, 121
- Maurice to Kingsley, on his 'Perseus,' and on originating a periodical, 122
- Maurice to Kingsley, on his dialogue, 'Phaethon,' that Macmillan should publish it, 123
- Maurice to D. Macmillan, on the same subject, 123
- Maurice to Kingsley, on the same subject, 124
- Maurice to his sister Priscilla, on his position and duties, 124
- Maurice to his Father and Mother, congratulating them on the anniversary of their wedding-day, 125
- Hughes, T., to editor, giving an account of Lord Goderich's pamphlet, 126
- Maurice to Ludlow, on Lord Goderich's pamphlet, 127
- Maurice to Ludlow, on democracy, monarchy, and aristocracy, 128-132
- Maurice to Kingsley, conveying his literary criticisms on 'Phaethon,' 132-136
- Maurice to Ludlow, on the influence of theology on all other studies, 136-138

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

Maurice to Kingsley, on deathbed stories, and literary suggestions for 'Hypatia,' 139-143

Maurice to Rev. J. Compton, on Mr. Compton's sermons, and on Unitarianism, 143

Maurice to D. Macmillan, on the Sabbath question, 144

Maurice to Rev. F. Garden, on the death of his wife, 145

Maurice to a Friend, on the Athanasian Creed, 146-149

Maurice to D. Macmillan, on the publication of some sermons, 149

Maurice to Erskine, announcing that he had dedicated a book to him, 150

Maurice to D. Macmillan, with the following letter as a reply to an habitual assailant, also inviting criticism on his 'Sabbath Sermons,' &c., 151

Maurice to D. Macmillan, on the maxim of all his books—"God all in all," 151-153.

1853.

Maurice to his Father, a New-Year's Day letter, 153

Maurice to D. Macmillan, on the Thirty-nine Articles, and his present views on Subscription, 154

Maurice to his sister Priscilla, on her illness, his desire to visit her, and on a work he is preparing for Unitarians, 155

Maurice to Ludlow, on the new constitution for the society, 159

Maurice to Ludlow, on the same subject, 161

Maurice to Mansfield, on his return to England, 161

Maurice to his sister Priscilla, on a Whitsun birthday, and on his 'Essays,' 164-166

Maurice to Kingsley, on Augustine and his post-baptismal life, 166

Maurice to Kingsley, on his 'Essays,' and on the Prayer-Book, 167-169

Maurice to Kingsley, on the consequences likely to result from the publication of his 'Essays,' 170

Maurice to Ludlow, on resigning his office of President of the Society for Promoting Co-operative Associations, 173

Maurice to Ludlow, on the same subject, 173, 174

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

- Maurice to Hare, on his correspondence with Dr. Jelf, 174
- Maurice to Hare, on the same subject, 175
- Maurice to Ludlow, on the King's College business, 176
- Maurice to Hare, on the same subject, 177
- Maurice to his Father and Mother, on the fifty-ninth anniversary of their marriage, 178
- Maurice to Hare, on the King's College business, 179
- Maurice to Hare, on the same subject, 180-182
- Hare to a Layman, on the points in dispute between Maurice and Jelf, 182
- Maurice to Colenso, thanking him for dedicating his Sermons to him, 185
- Maurice to Hare, on Jelf's letter and his own reply, 186, 187
- Maurice to Ludlow, replying to some remarks on his 'Essays,' 187
- Jelf to the Council of King's College, on the "unsound" passage in the 'Essays,' 188
- Maurice to Jelf, in reply, 189
- Maurice to Hare, giving his report of what took place at the meeting of the Council, 192-194
- Gladstone, Right Honourable W. E., to Lord Lyttelton, giving his account of the meeting and view of the matter in dispute, 194-196
- Denison, E. B., to Maurice, explaining the Bishop of Lichfield's absence from the meeting, 196
- Brodie, Sir B., to Archdeacon Hare, giving his account of the meeting, 197-199
- Gladstone, W. E., to Sir B. Brodie, on his amendment, and on the unjust nature of the decision, 199
- Maurice to Hare, on difficulties as to resignation, 202
- Furnivall, F. J., to Maurice, giving the popular view of the matter, 203
- Brodie, Sir B., to Archdeacon Hare, on a meeting at which the Bishop of Lichfield, the Dean of St. Paul's, and Mr. Anderson expressed regret at the late proceedings, 204
- Maurice to the Council of King's College, final letter to, 206-209
- Maurice to his late pupils at King's College, a letter of thanks, 213

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

- Maurice to Rev. J. Compton, on the subject of his dismissal, 213
- Maurice to Langley, on the same subject (1853), 214
- Maurice to the Committee of Education of Queen's College, bidding them good-bye, 215
- Reply of the Committee to Maurice, thanking him and expressing regret, 216
- Maurice to the pupils of Queen's College, thanking them for the present of a silver inkstand, 218
- Maurice to Rev. D. J. Vaughan, explaining his ideas as to Time and Eternity, 219
- Working men of London to Maurice, on his expulsion from King's College, 221, 222
- Members of Lincoln's Inn to Maurice, on the same subject, 223
- Maurice to the Members of Lincoln's Inn on his principles of teaching, preaching, and learning, 225-228
- 1854
- Maurice to Mr. R. H. Hutton, on Mr. Hutton's review of Maurice's "Theological Essays" in the Inquirer, 228
- Maurice to Kingsley, on proposed 'Cambridge Tracts,' 231
- Maurice to Rev. D. J. Vaughan, on Maurice's essay on the Atonement, and on the Evangelicals, 234
- Maurice to D. Macmillan, on Dr. Candlish's attack on him, &c., 237
- Maurice's reply to an Address accompanying a present of books from old King's College pupils, 238
- Maurice to Kingsley, on Mahomet, Atheism, the Crimean War, &c., 239
- Maurice to D. Macmillan, refusing to alter his writings, and on forebodings, 240, 241
- Maurice to Miss Gourlay, on a true Christian Freemasonry, the Evangelical school, and baptism, 241
- Maurice to Mrs. Julius Hare, on the occupations and nature of a future state, 242-249
- Maurice to Kingsley, on the unimportance of what Thomas Cooper thinks of Maurice or Kingsley, and the all-importance of what he thinks of God, 249
- Maurice to Kingsley, on the Crimean

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

War, the press, and the people, nationalities, visit to Glasgow, &c., 250

1855

Maurice to Miss Williams Wynn, on Bunsen, Niebuhr, the anti-English school of thought, &c., 251-253

Maurice to D. Macmillan, on the death of Hare, 255

Maurice to his Wife, on the same subject, 255

Maurice to Kingsley, on the death of Hare, sacrifice, and the Crimean War, 255

Maurice to Bunsen, on his book on Sacrifice, and on Hare, 257

Maurice to his Wife, on suffering and sorrow, 258

Maurice to Mrs. Augustus Hare, thanking her for a soothing and consolatory letter, 259

Maurice to Kingsley, on some mental doubts and difficulties, 260-262

Maurice to Kingsley, on the same subject, 263

Maurice to Miss Wynn, on the difficulty of realising the union of the Eternal with its manifestation, without forgetting one or other, 264

Maurice to Kingsley, on his own visit to Germany, and on Elizabethan times and the present (1855), 265

Maurice to Kingsley, on Greek myths and the Bible, 267

Maurice to Rev. J. Ll. Davies, on M. Talandier and the subject of an inaugural address, 269-271

Maurice to Kingsley, on the Church Catechism and the formularies of the Church, 271

Maurice to Kingsley, on his glorifying the past and decrying nowadays, 275

Maurice to Kingsley, on history and on the Civil Wars, 275-278

1856

Maurice to Strachey, on another unity than the Adamic, &c., 278

Maurice to Mrs. Augustus Hare, on his introduction to Hare's Charges, 278

Maurice to Kingsley, on his own 'Moral Philosophy,' and on Froude as a historian, 279

Maurice to Rev. S. Hansard, on the Christian and the Jewish Sabbath, 280-283

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

Maurice to Kingsley, on his pamphlet on the Sabbath Day, 294

Maurice to Mrs. Colenso, on difficulties at home and in Africa, 295-297

Maurice to J. M'Leod Campbell, thanking him for his book, and on Edwards, Knox, and the Atonement, 297

Maurice to Mr. Solly, on a review in the Inquirer, on his indifference as to defending his own position, and determination not to form a new sect, 299

Maurice to Trench, on Trench's appointment to the Deanery of Westminster, 300

1857

Maurice to Kingsley, on his 'Moral Philosophy' and his book on St John's Gospel, 301

Maurice to Ludlow, on subjects connected with the Working Men's College, 306

Maurice to Ludlow, on the same subject, 307-309

Maurice to Langley, on his lectures on St. John, and on opposition to, and correspondence with, Mansel, 310-312

Maurice to Ludlow, on the Indian Mutiny, and on cold and formal prayers, 313-314

Maurice to his Wife, on Dr. Moberly, 314

1858

Maurice to Miss Wynn, on the need for reformation, and his expectation of a crisis, 316

Maurice to Langley, on the only mode of reform of Scotch Calvinism, 317

Maurice to Ludlow, on the Sunday question, 319-321

Maurice to Kingsley, denouncing anonymous periodical writing, and proposing a magazine with signed names, 321-324

Maurice to Hutton, on the "I" and the "We" as symbols of unity and sectarianism in journalism, 324-326

1859

Maurice to Erskine, on the death of Miss Jane Stirling, and on Mansel's views, 345

Maurice to Miss Wynn, on the preaching of Spurgeon, 346

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

- Maurice to Ludlow, on the existence of evil, 347
 Maurice to A. Macmillan, on unfavourable reviews of 'What is Revelation?' 348
 Maurice to Rev. D. J. Vaughan, on the Trinity, 349-355
 Maurice to Strachey, announcing his having undertaken clerical duty at Ockham, 355
 Maurice to Rev. J. Ll. Davies, congratulating him on his marriage, 355

1860

- Maurice to Rev. Isaac Taylor, giving reasons against revising the Prayer-Book, and for a repeal of the Act of Uniformity, 356-361
 Maurice to his Wife, a humorous acceptance of invitation to breakfast, 361
 Maurice to an old Friend, explaining his principles and course in life, 364-368
 E. G. (a Stranger), to the Clerical Journal, explaining Maurice's views on eternal punishment, 368
 Maurice to E. G. (a Stranger), approving his exposition of the view of eternal punishment, 371
 819 Members of the Church of England to Maurice, 372
 Maurice's reply, 373
 Maurice to Ludlow, thanking him for the address, 378
 Maurice to Vaughan, on his (Vaughan's) sermons, on his influence with Unitarians at Leicester, and on Bunsen's illness, 379

1861

- Maurice to Hughes, on the Working Men's College, and on the theology of the creeds against the world, 380
 Maurice to Miss Wynn, on his sermon on the Collect for the Fourth Sunday in Advent, 382
 Maurice to Stanley, on the storm raised by the 'Essays and Reviews,' 382
 Maurice to the Bishop of Argyll, as to the Bishop's preaching at St. Peter's, and on Mr. Erskine's views on sacrifice, &c., 383
 Maurice to Hughes, on the principles of toleration, 384-386
 Maurice to Ludlow, on the scheme for

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

- 'Tracts for Priests and People,' 387-390
 Maurice to the Bishop of Argyll, on the 'Essays and Reviews,' 390
 Maurice to Ludlow, on Truth, as best arrived at by the independent statement of conflicting opinions, 391
 Maurice to a Lady, on the fulness and perfection of Christ's sacrifice and on the Communion for all, 393, 394
 Maurice to Ludlow, on the need of a point of reconciliation between the Jewish and the Western mind, to render the Bible intelligible, 395
 Maurice to Strachey, on a book of Mill's, 396
 Maurice to a Son (at Oxford), on the subject of his studies, 396
 Maurice to R. H. Hutton, on the Jowett controversy, 400

1862.

- Maurice to Hughes, suggesting a tract on inspiration, 401
 Maurice to R. H. Hutton, on his 'Moral Philosophy,' 402
 Maurice to Rev. E. Philips, on the personality of, and "belief" in, the devil, 402
 Maurice to Ludlow, on Mrs. Oliphant's 'Life of Irving,' 403
 Maurice to Ludlow, on Carlyle and Irving, 404
 Maurice to Rev. J. L. Ll. Davies, on the decision in Heath's case, 409
 Maurice to Langley, on the importance of clearing away the misrepresentation made of his views that he looks upon God as naturally the Father of all human beings, 409
 Maurice to a Son (at Oxford), on a conversation of Jowett's, 410
 Maurice to Rev. J. A. Macmahon, thanking him for a complimentary allusion to his 'Moral Philosophy,' 411
 Maurice to Rev. A. Starkey, on the Athanasian Creed, 412-417
 Maurice to a Son in the army, on the "callings" of men, 417
 Maurice to Davies, on Ruskin and Colenso, 421
 Maurice to Davies, giving an account of his interview with Colenso, 423 Maurice to Rev. S. Clark, on his

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

- resolution to resign Vere Street, 424
- Maurice to Kingsley, giving his various motives for desiring to resign Vere Street, 425-428
- Maurice to Stanley, defending his intentions to resign, 428-430
- Bishop of London (Tait) to Maurice, remonstrating with him, and requesting him to reconsider his decision, 431
- Bishop of London to Maurice, thanking him for suspending his intention to resign, 434
- Maurice to Stanley, regretting his hasty desire to resign, 434
- Maurice to a Son (at Oxford), on his abandoning his intention to resign, 435
- Maurice to a Son, on the appointment of Stanley to Westminster, and Trench to Dublin, 435
- Maurice to Hutton, on his 'Dialogues on Family Worship,' 436

1863

- Maurice to Hughes, on the American Civil War, 439
- Maurice to Rev. H. B. Purton, on his own works as "fragmentary conversations," and on the help given him by articulate answers, 440
- Maurice to Hutton, on M. Arnold's essay on Spinoza, 441
- Maurice to Rev. J. de la Touche, on the Church as a witness for a universal human union, 443
- Maurice to the same. The real issue is between trust in a present living God and atheism. Text-proofs and a book-made God having become hollow phrases, 444
- Maurice to the same. The simple lesson taught the child, "God is near you, and will hear your cry" is the lesson for all, 447
- Maurice to a Son (at Oxford), on Juvenal, 448
- Maurice to Kingsley, on (Kingsley's) Sermons on the Pentateuch, on a correspondence regarding the nature and principles of evidence, and on Paley, 449
- Maurice to Hutton, on miracles and myths, 453, 455
- Maurice to Hutton, on Renan and 'Romola,' 458

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

- Maurice to a Clergyman, on Commerce and Christianity, 459
- Maurice to Hutton, on the nature of Renan's influence, 461-463
- Maurice to Miss Wynn, on the same subject, 463-465
- Maurice to Hutton, on his (own) article on Renan, 465

1864

- Maurice to a Son, on the Christ of Renan, 465
- Maurice to the Times, on the Oxford Declaration of Faith, 468
- Maurice to the Hon. and Rev. W. H. Lyttelton, on the word Eternal, 471-477
- Maurice to a sceptic, on his readiness to meet him as man to man, provided only no conventionalisms, liberal or other, are interposed, 477
- Maurice to Stanley, on seeing Garibaldi, Kingsley's dispute with Newman, &c., 478
- Maurice to a Lady, on God as the Redeemer of the Will. "Complain on," 479-482
- Maurice to a Clergyman, refusing to assist in removing the Athanasian Creed from the service, 482
- Maurice to Sir E. Strachey, declining to meet Colenso, 485

1865.

- Maurice to a Clergyman, advising as to his treatment of Bishop Colenso, 487-491
- Maurice to Stanley, on subscription, 491
- Maurice to Kingsley, on theology, and on the Name into which all are baptised, 493
- Maurice to Ludlow, on President Lincoln's inauguration speech, &c., 497
- Maurice to Kingsley, on his book against Mansel, 498
- Maurice to Kingsley, on Mill's book against Hamilton, 498
- Maurice to a Son, on America, and on Mill's and Gladstone's election prospects, 499
- Maurice to Mr. J. Hodgkin, on inspiration and the Word of God, 499-501
- Maurice to Ludlow, on the duty of proclaiming God as the deliverer, 501

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

- Maurice to a Son, on Protestantism, and art and science, and on the education of whites and blacks, 502
 Maurice to Kingsley, on Subscription and the Articles, 503-507
 Maurice to Mr. King, thanking him for Robertson's 'Life and Letters,' 508
 Maurice to Rev. D. J. Vaughan. God in politics. Revelation as the discovery of God to a creature formed to know him, 509
 Maurice to Miss Wynn, on the book called 'Ecce Homo,' 511

1866.

- Maurice to Mr. King, on the writers in the Record, stopping Mr. King's proposed personal attack on them by name, 512
 Maurice to Bishop of Argyll, on Pusey's 'Eirenicon' and Newman's 'Letter,' 517
 Maurice to Bishop of Argyll, on the spirit and aim of the 'Eirenicon,' 517-519
 Maurice to his Wife, on an S.P.G. meeting regarding Colenso and the Bishop of Capetown, 519
 Maurice to his Wife, on thoughts on revisiting Oxford, 520
 Maurice to a Clergyman, on the force and meaning of the words "eternal life," 520-523
 Maurice to the same, on the possibility of sorrow in heaven, 523
 Maurice to Rev. J. H. Macmahon, on some Methodists wishing to join the Church, on the Church itself, and on heaven, 524
 Maurice to Ludlow, on a book on the Commandments he was writing, 525
 Maurice to Kingsley, on his candidature for the Cambridge Professorship, 543
 Maurice to the same, on the increased sympathy between old and young at Cambridge, 547
 Maurice to Erskine, on his election to Cambridge, 548
 Maurice to a Son, on Mazzini, 548
 Maurice to Ludlow, on Christian co-operation, 549
 Maurice to Ludlow, thanking him for his kind speech, 551
 Maurice to Erskine, on the death of Erskine's sister, 551

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

- Maurice to Kingsley, on his own inaugural lecture, 552

1867.

- Maurice to a Young Lady, on trust in the Deliverer from evil, &c., 555-557
 Maurice to a Son, on Gladstone's face, 557
 Maurice to the same, on democracy and aristocracy, 557
 Maurice to Miss Bell, on Christ as the High Priest of Humanity, and on our duty to own Him not as special followers of His but as men; the restoration and the resurrection, 559-561
 Maurice to Erskine, on the Bishop of Argyll preaching at Vere Street, and on conscience, 562
 Maurice to Langley, on the means of attracting Dissenters to the Church, 563
 Maurice to the Bishop of Argyll, on the Pastoral Letter of the Pan-Anglican Conference, 566-569
 Maurice to Miss Wynn, on the death of a sister, 569
 Maurice to the Bishop of Argyll, on the Catholic faith and popular heresies, 570-572 1868.

- Maurice to Erskine, on faith and trust as the sources of life, whether rational, personal, or other, 572-574
 Maurice to a Son, on God guiding the age and the persons in it, 574
 Maurice to Miss Wynn, on the Kingdom of Heaven, 575
 Maurice to Miss Wynn, on current events, 576
 Maurice to Erskine, on his (own) lectures on the conscience, 577
 Maurice to Miss Wynn, on an article on the Christian aspects of Comtism, &c., 578
 Maurice to a Friend, whose mother was dying, 579
 Maurice to the same, after his mother's death, 579
 Maurice to one whose son thought of joining the Church of Rome, on the common faith of Protestants and Romanists and their respective dangers, 580-583

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

1869.

Maurice to Dr. Dyster, on the death of his daughter, and on recognition in heaven, 587

Maurice to Miss Martin, on Louis XI. and Calvin, 588–590

Maurice to the Bishop of Argyll, on “conceiving” a Sacrament, 590

Maurice to Kingsley, on the injurious effects of competitive examinations, 591–593

Maurice to Mr. Drake, on his giving up residence in London, 593

Maurice to Mrs. Lindesay, on giving up his work in London, 596 1870.

Maurice to the Bishop of Argyll, on the meaning of the word “Revelation,” and on a paper of ‘Meditations and Prayers,’ 597

Maurice to the Rev. F. J. A. Hort, on his own book on National Morality, on Locke, Kant, and Mill, 597, 598

Maurice to Stanley, on Stanley’s letter in the Spectator, apropos to L. Stephens’ article on Broad Churchmen, and on Mr. Erskine’s death, 605

Maurice to a Son, on secular and denominational education, 610–612

Maurice to Hort, on giving up the Catechism in the education question, 612

Maurice to the Bishop of Argyll, on the prosecution of Bennett. Priestcraft implies a denial of the Ascension, 614

Maurice to the same, on Luther tilting at propositions, and on Newman’s dislike to Luther, 615

Maurice to the same, on a letter of his regarding Church promotion for Maurice, 616

Maurice to a Son, on English money worship, and on the Communion administered to the Revisers, 617

Maurice to the same, on France and Germany, 618

Maurice to the same, on the Franco-Prussian War, 618

Maurice to the same, on his own article about the Athanasian Creed, and on France and Germany, 618

Maurice to a Lady, as to whether the departed have a knowledge of those who remain behind them, 619–626

LETTERS—Vol. ii.

Maurice to Mr. Read, on Ritualism and the Ritualists, 626

1871.

Maurice to Mrs. Lindesay, on his acceptance of St. Edward’s, Cambridge, 628

Maurice to Hort, on the Purchas and Voysey judgments, 632

Maurice to Davies, on the Working Men’s College, 633

Letters, characteristic peculiarity of Maurice’s, ii. 4, 5

Letters on baptism, Maurice proposes to write a series of, i. 202, 203

Letters to a Quaker for Churchmen, Maurice’s, their object, i. 212, 237. See also “Kingdom of Christ.”

‘Letters, two, to a non-resident member of Convocation,’ i. 395

Lewis, Sir G. C., his views on evidence, ii. 510

Liberalism, a persecuting, ii. 430

Liberal Party, as such, anti-theological, hence Maurice’s want of sympathy with it, i. 183

‘Liberty, a Dialogue between a French Propagandist, an English Labourer, and the Editor,’ i. 472

Life, on the aim of, i. 266; a struggle between opposing principles, 297

Lichfield, Bishop of. See Lonsdale, Mr.

Life, eternal. See Eternal life.

Light, Maurice’s thoughts on, 119; his mission was to witness to the, 201; Coleridge’s desire for, 203; Maurice’s sympathy with this desire, 203; the acknowledgment of the, the point where philosophy and religion meet, 322, 323; on love and, ii. 19

Lincoln’s Inn, Maurice appointed to the chaplaincy of, i. 426; effect of his services at, 427–429; his wish to work for it and its neighbourhood, ii. 27; offers to resign his position at, but is requested to remain, 212; and receives an address from the members of, 223; his sermons at, printed by subscription, 301; twice declines to stand for the preachiership of, i. 355; ii. 315; Dr. Thompson appointed preacher at, 315

Lincoln, President, assassination of, ii. 496; Maurice on, 497

Lindesay, Mrs., Letters to, from Maurice, ii. 596, 628

Literary criticism on ‘Phaethon,’ ii. 132–

- 136; literary criticism and suggestions for 'Hypatia,' 140-143
- Little Ormond Yard, work begun in, i. 482
- Littérateurs*, Maurice's dislike to, ii. 323
- Liturgy, Maurice's view of the, i. 525; reasons for resisting the revival of the, ii. 356-361; 'The Faith of the,' 377
- Livy, i. 217
- Locke, his works represent the meaning and character of the Revolution of 1688, i. 467; the starting-point of modern English Philosophy, ii. 598
- Lockhart's disgust with Croker's attack on Maurice, ii. 71 n.
- Lombard, Peter, the 'Sentences of,' i. 466
- London, Bishop of (Blomfield), references to, i. 296, 308, 416, 418, 451; ii. 79 n., 87, 96, 101, 111, 192, 193, 195, 198, 200, 201, 203, 212, 214, 362, 363
- London, the Bishop of (Tait), letter to Maurice from, ii. 431, 434; concurs in the Privy Council's decision in the cases of Williams and Wilson, 466; references to, 568; the prosecution of Bennett, a serious trial for, 614
- London Debating Society, origin of the, 76; Maurice's connection with, i. 74-76
- London Literary Chronicle*, i. 79
- London labour and the London poor, Mr. H. Mayhew's articles on, ii. 13
- Lonsdale, Mr., principal of King's College, i. 283; his promotion to a bishopric, 355; his letter to a friend in approval of Maurice, 529; another letter regarding Maurice, ii. 196; references to, 200, 204
- Lord's Prayer, Maurice's sermons on the, i. 457; the, and Hartley Coleridge, 501
- 'Lost souls,' explanation of the phrase, ii. 415
- Louis, Lady, Sir E. Strachey's letters to, regarding Maurice's views on various matters, i. 202 et seq., 302 et seq., 250
- Louis XI., on the character of, ii. 588
- Love, eternal. See Charity. On human and divine, i. 527; the power and eternity of God's, ii. 227
- Low Church, the representative of the individualising faith of the middle and trading classes, i. 343. See Evangelicals.
- Ludlow, Mr., commencement of his friendship with Maurice, i. 430; letters to, on socialism and atheism, 458-461; denounces physical force Chartism, 472; Hare's charge against, 477; attends weekly meetings at Maurice's house, 481; letter to, about Froude, 519; introduces Cooper, the Chartist tailor to Maurice, 519; letters to, from Maurice, 530, 536; takes part in the Chartist meetings, 538; his article 'on Froude, 539; letters to, on co-operation and Christian communism, ii. 6-10; his visit to Paris, 13; letters to, from Maurice, 23-30; his feeling of regret at Maurice's opposition to one or two schemes, 30; letters to, from Maurice, 33-35, 42-45, 45; his evidence on co-operation, 52; draws up a charter for Queen's College, 54; becomes editor of the Christian Socialist, 55; letters to, 60, 62, 63; his account of a Socialist dinner, 62; his attempt to establish an East-end Needle-women's Workshop, 65; and another project, 65; letter to, on the principle of association and brotherhood, 76; his appeal to the men of the iron trades, 104; letters to, from Maurice, 104-107; drafts a Bill for legalising co-operative societies, 119; protests against the professors giving up their authority at Queen's College, 121; letters to, from Maurice, 127-132, 136-138, 159, 161, 173, 174, 176; publishes a statement of the facts of Maurice's case, 212; arranges for the printing of Maurice's Lincoln's-Inn sermons, 301; letters to, from Maurice on the subject of the Working Men's College, 306-309; letters to, 313, 314, 319-321, 347, 378; his programme for 'Tracts for Priests and People,' 386; letter to, from Maurice on the subject, 387, 391; letters to, 395, 403, 404; his sympathy with the North in the American Civil War, 438; letters to, from Maurice, 497, 501, 525, 549, 551; his speech at the farewell meeting to Maurice at the Working Men's College, 551
- Lushington, Dr., ii. 355; his judgment on Mr. Heath, Maurice's view of, ii. 398, 399; references to, 427, 429; his judgment in the cases of Williams and Wilson reversed by the Privy Council, 466
- Lushington, Mr. Harding, i. 179
- Luther, the apparition that appeared to, i. 82; Alexander Knox on, 172; New-

- man a declared antagonist of, 182; Sterling compares Maurice to, 256; Ward's mistaken notion regarding, 357; Hare on Ward's notion of, 362; Hare the defender of, ii. 257; the reverence of, for the Scriptures and for St. Paul, 602; on his tilting at propositions, 615; the cause of Newman's bitter dislike to, 615; Maurice's delight in the hymns of, 638
- Lympsham, Maurice invited to reside at, i. 139; meets Mr. Harding at, 153
- Lyndhurst, Lord, Maurice's opinion of, i. 296-297
- Lyttelton, Lord, his candidature for the office of Lord High Steward, i. 294, 296
- Lyttelton, the Hon. and Rev., ii. 504; letters to from Maurice on the word "Eternal," ii. 471-477

M

- MACAULAY, his article in the Edinburgh Review on the University system, i. 71; feeling of, on Ward's case, 395; supports the Dissenters' Chapels Bill, 436; his success as a historian, ii. 276
- Macchiavelli's 'Discourses on Livy,' i. 217
- Mackenzie, James, ii. 251
- Mackintosh, Sir James, i. 35, 78, 80
- Macmahon, Rev. J. A., letter to, from Maurice, ii. 411
- Macmillan, Daniel, his letters to Archdeacon Hare on the difficulties of young shopmen in London, 288; and on the state of the working classes in London, 329; letters to, from Maurice, 331, 337-342, 347-350, 366, 368, 382; ii. 35, 123, 144, 149, 151-153, 154, 237
- Macmillan, Alexander, letters to, from Maurice, ii. 348, 377
- Magic lantern, exhibition of a, i. 543
- Mahomet, on the influence of, ii. 239
- Mandeville's 'Bees,' Law's answer to, on a preface to, i. 377, 381, 382, 386
- Manichæanism, effect on Augustine of his escape from, ii. 109, 166
- Manning, afterwards Cardinal, on his appointment as Archdeacon, i. 302; character of, 351; relations with Sterling, 506; Maurice's acquaintance with, 533; his immense influence with the clergy, 545
- Mansel, Mr., his letters regarding Maurice's opinions, ii. 237 and n.; Maurice's antagonism to, and correspondence with, 310-312; his assertion in his Bampton Lectures of the first principles of agnosticism, 327, 328; points of difference between Maurice and, 332; Dr. Thomson draws Maurice's attention to the lectures of, 333; his view of orthodoxy, 335 and n.; two stages of the controversy between Maurice and, 336; one cause of misunderstanding, 337; regarded as the great champion of orthodoxy, 339; the logical result of his lectures, 339; Mr. Chrétien's review of the lectures of, 340; why Maurice joins issue with, 367; his contemptuous tone towards Maurice adds to the importance of the Cambridge vote, 543; reference to, 608
- Marcus Aurelius, on the 'Meditations' of, i. 466
- Marriott, Mr., i. 179; character of, 351, 506
- Marshall, James, account of a Socialist dinner at his house, ii. 62
- Martineau, Miss, on the book called 'The Sick Room,' by, i. 364; Maurice's reasons for refusing joint teaching with, 469-471; his opinion of her book on Egypt, 470
- Marryat, Captain, the novelist, and 'Eustace Conway,' i. 163
- Massey, Gerald, ii. 36
- Martin, Miss, letter to, from Maurice, ii. 588-590
- Maurice, Henry, mentioned in Calamy's 'History of the Ejected Ministers,' ancestor of Michael, i. 6 n.
- Maurice, Michael, his position at the birth of his son, Frederick Denison, i. 1-8; his birth and parentage, 6; son of an "orthodox" Dissenting minister, 6; sent to Hoxton Academy to be educated, 6; issues from Hackney College a Unitarian in opinion, 7; but an enthusiastic political Liberal, 7; abandons a considerable property rather than renounce Unitarianism, 7; tone of his mind on religious questions, 7; his opinion of toleration, 7; his reputation as a preacher, 8; character of his sermons, 8; his marriage, 8; settles at Normanstone, near Lowestoft, 8; his family and surroundings, 8; receives the sons of Dissenters, and of clergymen and members of the Church of England, to educate, 8; his friends and personal influence, 9; Unitarianism of his eldest daughters, 9; he removes from Clifton, and thence to Frenchay, 10; remarkable change of opinions among his family, 11, 20, 22; his political opinions, 15; freedom of his Biblical criticisms, 19; letter to, from his daughter Anne, on behalf of herself and her sister Elizabeth renouncing Unitarianism, 23; his reply, 23; letter addressed to him on the subject by his wife, 23-25; his reply to her, 26; exacts a promise from his daughters that they will not influence the younger children, 26; indignation of his co-religionists on the subject, 26; his various schemes of social improvement, 37; his account of Maurice's leaving Cambridge, 72; on his son's disinclination for society, 76; on his literary undertakings, 79; loses his entire income, 89; effects of this on the spirit of the family, 90; his sense of gratitude to his children for their conduct, 90; his distress at his son's not consulting him, 92; letter to him from his son on the subject, 92-96; effect of Irving's service on him, 116; his account of his daughter Emma's interpretation of a passage of Scripture, 123; letters to, from Maurice, 125, 132-138, 152, 158, 163, ii. 66, 97, 125, 153, 178

maurice, Mrs. Michael, mother of Frederick D. Maurice, i. 8; her moral and intellectual qualities, 14; her religious opinions, 14; her grief for the death of a favourite child, 14; change in her religious views, 20; her letter to her husband, on the subject of her daughters' change in their religious views, 23-25; she informs her husband of her resolution to attend another place of worship than his, 26; her position in relation to her daughters, 28; peculiarity of her Calvinism, 29; her desire that her son (F. D. Maurice) should be one of the "elect," though she cannot claim for herself that superiority to others, 29; hopes he will be a minister "of the everlasting gospel," 30; aids in her husband's schemes of social improvement, 37; letters to, from her son, 70, 91; remarks on the illness of her daughter Emma, 104; letter to her son on the discontent among the common people, 114; letter to, from her son, 128-131; her selfishness and self-depreciation, 154; letter to, from her son, showing the influence her state of mind was having on the formation of his thought, 154-

157; another from him expressing satisfaction with his position at Guy's, 193; letter to, on same subject as that on p. 154, 218-220; congratulates her son on his marriage, 234; account of a youthful protégé of hers, 382; letter to her on the subject of his scepticism, 383; letter to, 406; visits the British Museum, 543; letter to, from Maurice, on his second wedding day, 552; letters to, from Maurice, ii. 54, 65, 125, 178; her death, 238; her letters the dictionary of her son's writings, 531

MAURICE, FREDERICK DENISON (1805):—
 birth and parentage, i. 1 historical retrospect, explanatory of his father's position, 1-8 the family circle, 8
 autobiographical recollection of childhood, 12-21 son of a Unitarian minister, 13 influence of that fact on his life, 13 nature of his father's Unitarianism, 7, 8, 13 character of his mother, 14 his earliest impressions of his birth-place, 15 his father's political opinions, 15 his own lack of country tastes, 16 and love for anything social or political, 16 some early friends, 16
 his childish reading and love of truth, 17 removes from Suffolk to Clifton, 17 and from Clifton to Frenchay, near Bristol, 18 his youthful likes and dislikes in reading, 18, 19 prefers anything dramatic or historic, 19 influence of Neal's 'History of the Puritans' on his mind, 19 intended for a Unitarian minister, 19 his mind early receives a theological complexion, 19 early habits of Bible-reading, 19 freedom of his father's criticisms on the Bible, 19 change in the religious beliefs of the family, 20 his cousin, three sisters, and mother, renounce Unitarianism, 20, 22 influence of these events on his mind, 21, 22 his father undertakes his secular education, 27

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. i.

intense individuality of each member of the family, 28 desire of his mother that he should be one of the "elect," and conviction that she was not one, 29
 she wishes him be a minister "of the everlasting Gospel," 30 influence exercised upon him by his sister Emma, 30, 31 anecdotes of his childhood, 32-34 wide range of his boyish reading, 34 letter to his sister Mary (1815) on a meeting of the British and Foreign School Society, 35, 36 his own account of his boyish studies, 37 assists his father in his social improvements and Sunday-school teaching; 37 reminiscences of his boyhood, 38-41 his desire for Unity, and belief in the Trinity in Unity, 41 to escape religious difficulties, he selects the Bar as a profession, 42 reads for it with Mr. Clarkson, 42 terrified by Calvinism, 43
 confides his religious troubles to a lady friend, 43 their exchange of views on the subject, 43 remarks on mental conflicts, 44
 proceeds to Trinity College, Cambridge, 44, 45 in London on his way to Cambridge, 45 state of his mind at this period, 45 letter to his father on the subject, 46 to his mother describing the Cambridge lectures, 47 his account of Julius Hare, 48 and party votes at Trinity, 49 defends the Cambridge University system, 49, 50 his anxiety about his father's health, 51 acquaintance with John Sterling, 52 his experiences in Hare's class-room, 52-55 effects of Hare's teaching on his character, 52-55 his mental development, and respect of his fellow students for his intellectual and moral power, 56, 57 letter of advice to his sister Priscilla, 57-59 migrates to Trinity Hall, 59 becomes joint editor of the Metropolitan Quarterly Magazine, 61

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. i.

his contributions to it, 61-69
 his defence of freedom of thought, 63
 state of his mind at this period, 64
 neither a Unitarian nor a Calvinist, 64 in literature an aristocrat, 64 on the egotism of Wordsworth and of the age, 65 on Bentham's 'Book of Fallacies,' 66 his opposition to Utilitarianism, 66 attacks the system of young ladies' education, 66-69 his opinion of Blair's 'Lectures,' 68 and of the prose of poets, 69 prepares to leave the University, 70 his later opinion of the University system, 70 a conversation with the Civil Law Professor, 71 in London working for the Bar, 71 returns to Cambridge, and takes a First Class in Civil Law, 71 prepares some private pupils for Oxford, 71 growing tendencies towards communion with the Church of England, 72, 73 contributes to the Westminster Review, 74 an article on Montgomery's 'Pelican Island,' 74 and one on Wolfe Tone's 'Memoirs,' 74 becomes a member of the London Debating Society, 74-76 his disinclination to go into society, 76 his chief resorts in London, 76 his reply to Fanny Kemble's insinuation, 77 his conduct in reference to theatre-going, 77 his differences in opinion from Sterling, 77 contributes to the Athenæum a series of sketches of contemporary authors, 78 becomes part proprietor of the London Literary Chronicle, 79
 the Chronicle and the Athenæum are united, 79 he becomes the editor of the united journals, 79 his political opinions at this time no Radical, 79 illustration of his views of men and things, 80-88 his hostility to Utilitarianism, 80 aversion to systems and parties, 81

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. i.

on the value of arithmetic in education, 81
 on originality in a book, 82 on the weaknesses and strength of great men, 82 on the influence of reviewers, 83 on the injustice meted to teachers of truth, 84 on the sordid desire for "getting on," 84 plea for the Spanish exiles, 85 on the "form" which his thoughts assumed, 86 and the distinction he made between "religion" and "theology," 86 on the theology and faith of women, 86, 87 changes at home—his father's loss of income, 89 great mental depression, 90 pledges himself, along with Sterling and Whitmore, to write a novel, 90 letter to his mother on his mental state, 91 and to his father, as to his tendency to reticence, 92 his possible return to Cambridge, 92 the question of taking orders, 93, 94 on the state of his mind in relation to God, 94, 95 on exhortation and self-examination, 96 letter to Julius Hare regarding the Athenæum, 96
 the failure of the Athenæum and the illness of his sister depress him deeply, 98
 he decides to go to Oxford, 99 letter to Julius Hare on the subject, 99 is advised by Hare to return to Cambridge, 100 letter to Hare in reply, 103 proceeds to Oxford, 104 finishes his novel, 104 his sister's enthusiasm regarding it, 104
 Colburn decides it is too long, 106 to his sister Priscilla on the power of Christ's death, 106 visits London to arrange for the disposal of his novel, 107 to Priscilla, regarding London preachers, 107 his account of Edward Irving's preaching, 107 becomes acquainted with Mr. W. E. Gladstone and Mr. Bruce, afterwards Lord Elgin, 108

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. i.

the latter becomes his most intimate college friend, 108 and directs his attention to Mr. Erskine's 'Brazen Serpent,' 108 which produces an important effect on his mind, 108 spends the long vacation at home, recasting his novel, 110 decides from lack of funds to give up his next term, 110 receives generous offers of assistance from friends, 111-113 returns to Oxford, 113
 is appealed to in reference to Irving's "miracles," 116 his views on the "miracles" and on light, 118-120 on Mr. Erskine, 121
 he is baptised a member of the Church of England, 123 at his sister's death-bed, 123 receives an offer of £100 for his novel, 123 his feelings at his sister's death, 124 decides to be examined for his degree, 124 reflections on the discipline of the coming age, 125 his suppressed thought in connection with the relationship in which he stood to the members of his family, 126 believes the order of God to be founded on relationships, 127 effects of Hare and Plato on his convictions, 128 his mental perplexities, and on relationships, 128-131 takes a Second Class at Oxford, 131 prepares his deceased sisters' papers under the title of 'Memorials of Two Sisters,' 131 letter to his father on communion with God, 132 on communion with God, and his manifestation in Christ, 134-138 takes pupils at Ryde, 138 on the voice of the Spirit and of Providence, 138, 139 receives an invitation to act as curate, 139 on Protestantism and the Papacy, 140-142 on the spirit of the age, 143, 144 his Unitarian friends scandalised at his becoming a clergyman of the Church of England, 145 his mother's defence of him, 146

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. i.

- his influence on Mr. Stephenson, and his memoir of that gentleman, 147–152
- his view of the ordination service, 152
- gives cottage lectures at Frenchay, 153
- becomes curate of Bubbenhall, 153
- letter to his mother showing the effect on the development of his thought of her position towards the sects of her daughters, 154.
- Confer with, i. 28, 29, 30
- letter to his father on the eve of his ordination, 158
- his answers at ordination, 159
- character of the period when he began his duties, 160
- his occupations at Bubbenhall, and his thoughts on the Oxford movement, 161–163
- publication of 'Eustace Conway,' 163
- Captain Marryat and the novel, 163
- criticism on, and Coleridge's thoughts on, 164–166
- he is toasted three times at the 'Apostles' Club,' 165
- on the Universal Church, 166
- the Church a kingdom, 167
- his views of subscription as a defence of liberty, 168
- this view approved by the leaders of the Oxford party, 169
- who urge him to throw his thoughts into a pamphlet, 169
- letters to Mr. Acland on the subject, 169–171
- writes 'Subscription no Bondage,' 170
- his opinion of Alexander Knox, 171
- autobiographical letter, giving a retrospect of his life up to 1835, 173–184
- fate of 'Subscription no Bondage,' 174
- his early years at Cambridge, 175
- his associates there, and friendship with Sterling, 176
- his London life in 1828, 177–179
- his recollections of Oxford in 1831, 179
- his account of the rise of Tractarianism, 180
- and of the use and abuse of Articles, 180, 181
- position of the Oxford party as to subscription, 182
- the Evangelicals, and his position as to them, 182, 183
- opposed to the anti-theological principles of the Liberal party, 183

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. i.

- his view of them under their new name of Broad Churchmen, 184
- writes on 'Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy,' for the 'Encyclopædia Metropolitana,' 185
- his friends endeavour to obtain him the chaplaincy of Guy's Hospital, 185
- the parting point between him and the Oxford school, 186
- effect of the teaching of that school on his mind, 186
- his hatred of Popery as anti-national and anti-catholic, 187
- enters on his duties as chaplain at Guy's, 188
- to a friend on the death of a relation of the friend's, and on the Fall and Redemption, 188–190
- on the Hampden controversy and Dr. Newman, 191
- on being asked to be a godfather, and on Sterling's preaching, 192
- his own view of his qualifications as a tutor, 194
- correspondence with Mr. E. Strachey on the subject of teaching him, 194–198
- undertakes to lecture twice a week at Guy's on Moral Philosophy, 197
- account of his ordinary life at Guy's, 198 et seq.
- Sir E. Strachey's notes on life at Guy's, 198 et seq.
- his striking moral and mental characteristics, 199–201
- proposes to write a series of letters on Baptism, 202
- his object in doing so, and his views on the subject, 203
- his views on light and national life, 203
- on the qualities desirable in a wife, 204
- on Dr. Pusey's tract on Baptism, 205
- his personal religion and habit of prayer, 205
- his complaints against the High Church party, 206
- offered a tutorship at Downing College, Cambridge, 206, 207
- his views on the Millennium, 208
- and on the covenant of Baptism, 208
- consents to be named for the Professorship of Political Economy at Oxford, 210
- his reasons for so doing, 210
- on the First Epistle to the Corinthians, 211

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. i.

to be deemed unpractical, the mortification of his life, 211, 212 his first letter to Quakers for Churchmen, 212 his momentary connection with the leaders of the Oxford party, 213 his views on "Baptismal Regeneration," 214 his second letter to a Quaker on Baptism, 214 on a course of study, 214–218 on his mother's illness, the power and character of God, and on a tract on Baptism, 218 his breach with Dr. Pusey on the subject of Baptism, 221 two striking elements in his character—his humility and a conviction that the Spirit spake through and by him words he must utter, 221 extract illustrating his determination to speak, 222 withdraws from the contest for the chair of Political Economy, 222
 the open breach between him and the Oxford school, 222 on his breach with the Oxford party, advantages of attending a college, and on study, 222–224 on the Church and the High Church party, 225 his acquaintance with Anna Barton, 227 letter to Hare on Sterling and on his own happiness, 228 influence which his marriage exercised on him, 229 letters to Miss Barton, 230–233 reflections on the first welcome birthday in his life, 231 to the Rev. R. C. Trench, on his approaching marriage, 233 his marriage, and congratulatory letter from his mother, 234 autobiographical 'Explanatory Letter' by, 235–240 how he became chaplain at Guy's, 235
 the principle of his preaching there, 236
 Dr. Pusey's tract on Baptism severs his connection with the High Church party, 236, 237 his view of the difference between the old and the younger Quakers, 237 his pamphlets to Quakers form the 'Kingdom of Christ,' 238 Tract XC. and the protest of the four Tutors, 238

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. i.

the guiding principle of his life—union in Christ as the Head of all men, freedom from party trammels, 239 his thankfulness for this, and for the strength he received from his married life, 240 sent into this world to persuade men to recognise Christ as the centre of all human fellowship, 240 his 'Letters to a Quaker' provoke the hostility of the religious press, 241 the peculiarity of his position their vantage ground, 242, 245 his war with them, notably the Record, 244 continues the 'Kingdom of Christ' in successive tracts, 244 on taking orders, under a sense of inadequate intensity of feeling, 245–248 his view of Episcopacy, 247 on the distinction between "you" and "thou," 248 on Neander, 248
 his antagonism to Carlyle, 250 his inability to enjoy the society of Sterling as he had done, 250 his opinion of Carlyle and Coleridge, 250, 251 and of J. S. Mill, 252 on the characteristics of the books of the New Testament, 253–255 letters to his wife, 255–257 on the ground of human fellowship, 257–260 his views on sects, 259, 260 on the battle between the flesh and spirit, 260–262 on justification, 262, 263 death of his sister Elizabeth, 264 nature and effect of her influence on him, 264 on the death of still-born child, 265 on the aim of life, 266 his 'Lectures on Education,' 270 on his own work and on self-discipline, 271, 272 undertakes the joint editorship of the Educational Magazine, 273 on his 'Lectures on Education,' and his contributions to the 'Encyclopædia,' 274, 275 on Sterling's article on Carlyle, 276 his views on education, 277 opposed to State education, 277 on Chartism, Carlyle, and his 'History of the French Revolution,' 278, 279

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. i.

- on his article for the 'Encyclopædia,' and on Carlyle, 281
- proposes to go to Switzerland, 281
- and to stand for a professorship in King's College, 281
- on Carlyle's lecture on Mahomet, 282, 283
- elected Professor of English Literature and Modern History at King's College, 283
- on Nature and Switzerland, 284
- on the Government compromise on the education question, 285
- on the social and political aspect of Switzerland, 286
- on Rationalism, and Schelling and Cousin's antidote to, 289
- proposes to lecture on the Prologue to Chaucer's 'Canterbury Tales,' 290, 291
- remarks on 'King John,' 290
- on teaching composition, 291
- on humility and his lecture on Chaucer, 291, 292
- on an article on Carlyle in the Quarterly, 293
- his first lecture on the Growth of the English Nation and its Literature, 293
- on the qualifications of Lords Lyndhurst and Lyttelton for the office of Lord High Steward, 294-297
- life a struggle between opposing principles, 297
- on his responsibility in connection with the Church, 298
- his lectures at King's College, 299-301
- on despondency, 301
- on holidays and festivals, 303
- on the death of Wilberforce's wife, 304
- on the Epistle to the Romans, 304
- his reply to a letter on 'The Kingdom of Christ,' 305
- thoughts on Convocation, 308
- on the ordination of suffering, 311
- and the ages of the antediluvians, 311
- reminiscences of his King's College Lectures, 312-318
- his views on the Jerusalem bishopric, 319, 320, 325 et seq.
- on Whewell's appointment to Trinity, 320
- on Catholicism v. Popery, 321
- on Scott's lectures on certain aspects of science, 322, 323
- on the term "Protestant Church," 325
- on a true Centre of Unity for the whole Church, 326

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. i.

- his horror of sectarianism, 327
- acquiesces in the settlement of the Jerusalem bishopric question, 327
- on the death of a friend, 328
- D. Macmillan's letter to Hare—a cry for help to the working classes, 329
- 'Tracts to Reasonable Creatures,' his proposed method of answering, 330, 331
- his 'Christmas Day, and other Sermons,' 332
- on the Bible and the Church, 333
- on the difficulty of preaching intelligible sermons, 334
- his habitual mode of referring to the parables, 334 n.
- on Thirlwall's 'Charge,' 336
- his life experience of many sects, 337
- his reply to Dr. Samuel Brown, 337-342
- his letter to Lord Ashley on right and wrong ways of supporting Protestantism, 342-345
- provokes the hostility of both parties, 344
- on the character of his later intercourse with Sterling, 345-347
- an illustration of this, 346
- the cry for a Personal Centre, 348
- on the function of Rationalists, 349
- his desire to be all things to all men, 350
- visits the Isle of Wight, 350-352
- his remarks on Wilberforce, Manning, and Marriot, 351
- accused of being a Tractarian, i. 353
- his reply to a suggestion that he should become a candidate for the Principalship of King's College (1843), 355
- his views as to what he would like in life, 356
- demonstrates his unsuitability for the position suggested, 357
- his regard for, and desire to conciliate, the Dissenters, 358, 359
- on the meaning of some chapters in Ephesians, 363
- on Miss Martineau's 'Sick Room,' and on Romanism, 364
- singular fatality of the season of Easter to the Maurice family, 366
- thoughts about Sterling, 367
- on the development doctrine of the High Church party, 367
- on Tracts for the People, 368
- and the necessity of their having a knowledge of the Living God, 369

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. i.

- his first letter to Charles Kingsley, 371
- on the study of the Scriptures, 372
- writes an introduction to Law's answer to Mandeville, 377
- on pain and sickness, 378
- reflections on Sterling's death, 378-381
- his scruples regarding his introduction to Law, 382
- letters to a young sceptic, 383
- motives of his preface to Law, 386
- character of his works, 389
- his opinion of Ward's views as to subscription, 391
- his desire for a protest against proposed new statutes at Oxford, 391
- writes two letters on the subject, 393
- on conscientious subscription, 396
- and "eternal life," 396-398
- his views on this subject influence the whole course of his life, 398
- his reverence for the Thirty-nine Articles, 399
- their value in protecting freedom of conscience, 399
- his reference to Ward's attack on him, 401
- his wife's illness and death, 403-410
- his objections to becoming Master of the Temple, 410
- thoughts on Whitsuntide and Trinity Sunday, 412-414
- appointed Boyle Lecturer, 416
- letters to Mrs. A. and to J. Hare on the death of Marcus Hare, 417
- appointed Warburton Lecturer, 418
- Epistle to the Hebrews to be the subject of his lectures, 419
- appointed Professor of Theology at King's College, 421
- on Newman's 'Theory of Development,' 422-425
- on the theological appointments at King's College, 425
- appointed to the chaplaincy of Lincoln's Inn, 426
- effect of his preaching at Lincoln's Inn, 427-429
- commencement of his friendship with Mr. Ludlow, 430
- on the education scheme of 1847, 432-434
- his view of the Dissenters' Chapels Bill, 434-443
- on Mr. Gladstone's candidature for the University of Oxford, 436-443
- his pamphlet on the subject of the Oxford election, 443

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. i.

- promises to write a preface for Kingsley's 'Saint's Tragedy,' 443
- his visit to Linlathen, 443
- account of his daily life, 444
- thoughts on All Saints' Day, 444
- his views on the admission of Jews to Parliament, 445-449
- and on the Hampden controversy, 446, 453
- correspondence with Kingsley regarding the 'Saints' Tragedy,' 446-449
- feels his name becoming offensive, 447
- Dr. Jelf's first attack on him, because of his supporting the Jews and Dr. Hampden, 451
- on Hare's 'Life of Sterling,' 452
- on Schleiermacher, 453, 454
- founds Queen's College, 455
- his sermons on the Lord's Prayer, 457
- thoughts on Socialism and Atheism, 458, 459
- proposes to issue a series of weekly tracts to the people, 461
- on the 'Saint's Tragedy,' and on Germany, 462
- on the first issue of 'Politics for the People,' 463
- on a course of metaphysical and philosophical reading, 463-469
- on the relation between English and German thought, 468
- on a union between University and Queen's College professors, 469-471
- the first number of 'Politics for the People' issued, 471
- his contributions to it, 472
- extract from his article on 'Fraternity,' i. 473
- defends Kingsley and Ludlow against Hare's strictures, 476
- explains the principles on which he desires to conduct the journal, 478
- as it does not pay its expenses it is abandoned, 480, 481
- his account of his visit to Prees and Eccleshall, 481
- he and his friends begin work in Little Ormond Yard, 482
- Mr. T. Hughes' introduction to them, 483
- on European politics in 1848, 484
- his own political starting-point, 485
- on kings reigning by the grace of God, 484-487
- account of the Bible classes at Queen's Square, 488-495
- importance of these classes on the form of his later writings, 494

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. i.

- is engaged to be married to Miss Hare, 497
- some reflections on time and eternity, 497
- his sermons on the Prayer-Book, 497, 501
- on the relations of husband and wife, 498
- on ordinations and weddings, 500
- his desire for intenser impressions, 500
- his disinclination for work, and the need he has for the Spirit to help him, 501
- on Hartley Coleridge, 502
- his daily work, and his feeling of insecurity as to his position at King's College, 502-504
- his defence of his dealing with Sterling, 505
- feels himself to be a man of war against all parties, 506
- that he may be a peacemaker between all men, 506
- on the responsibility of the Church, 507
- the evil of the time lies in refusing to acknowledge God as the author of all good, 508
- his view of the Communion Service, 508
- the difference between Hare's view and his own as to the position of the English Church, 509
- "Christ is in you" the one theme of preaching to beggars and reprobrates, 509, 510
- on Coleridge as a critic, 510
- on the Bible and the Prayer-Book, 511
- his desire for working-class meetings, 513
- all good of all men from God, all evil is in being apart from Him, 514
- on a speech at Exeter Hall, his loss of voice, and the attacks of the Record, 515, 516
- on Froude's 'Nemesis of Faith,' 516-519
- on Cooper, the Chartist tailor, 519
- his recollection of Easter sorrows, 519
- on the power of the word "Redemption," 519
- his letter to Dr. Jelf, explaining his views on the Prayer-Book, the Church, the Articles, the Creeds, and the Liturgy, 521-525
- on the power of words, 526

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. i.

- on the Communion Confession, 526
- on human and divine love, 527
- his opinion of Mr. Hamilton, of St. Ernan's, 527
- the clergyman's good news, 528
- Bishop Lonsdale's defence of, 529
- on the honour of persecution, 530
- on his sermons, and on biographies, 531
- on the Record, and his work in the world, 532
- on the newspaper attacks on the Sterling club, 532
- on Erskine, Manning, Bishops Wilberforce and Short, 533
- reflections on Passion Week, 534, 535
- on the kindness of medical men, 536
- his meetings with Chartists, 536-539
- his desire to show sympathy to Froude, 539
- on a clergyman about to become a Romanist, 539
- on Reformation, the Resurrection, and the kingdom of God, 540
- on the associations connected with Clifton and Hurstmonceux, 540, 541
- on Germany, and on some personal recollections, 542, 543
- on Trinity Sunday, a working-class meeting, and a meeting of the National Society, 544
- reflections on the Society's meeting, 545, 546
- dines at the Apostles' Club, 547
- on Carlyle's and Hare's life of Sterling, 548
- his account of a day in the country with ragged boys, 548
- his second marriage day, 552

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.

- the eve of the impending movement, ii. 1
- sketch of the powers and qualities of the leader, 2, 3
- his eloquence not oratory, 3
- but sometimes more powerful, 3
- instances of its influence, 3, 4
- characteristic peculiarity of his letters, 4, 5
- on co-operation and Christian communism, 6, 7
- his vocation that of a Church reformer, 7
- Church and social reformation, 8
- the State conservative, the Church communist, 8, 9

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.
 a proposal to protest against the attacks of the Record, 11, 12 on the Professorship of Divinity at Cambridge, 14 his letter to Mr. Hort on Eternal Punishment, 15–23 on the personality of the devil, 21–23 opposed to the formation of a health league, 23–27 his wish to work in his own place, 26 on Sidney Herbert's emigration scheme, 28 after some reluctance, goes to the dinner at which it is determined to set up Co-operative Workshops, 31 asserts that selfishness or competition is not the law of life, 32 desires the withdrawal of his name from the 'Saint's Tragedy,' 32 on a series of tracts on Christian Socialism, 33–36 on a course of philosophical reading, 37–39 his views on co-operation, 40, 41 declines to become a member of the Central Board for organising and regulating co-operative associations, 42
 his reasons for so doing, 40–45 agrees to continue to act with the original co-operative promoters, 45 his reply to certain objections against co-operation, 46–49 he is assailed by the "religious" press with a storm of obloquy for participating in co-operation, 50, 51
 visits Germany, 53
 on men of talent taking orders, 53 resigns his office of Chairman of Committee at Queen's College, 54 on his connection with Kingsley, 54 his contributions to, and dealings with the other contributors to, the Christian Socialist, 55 makes a tour through Lancashire, 56 his labour in connection with the Council of Promoters, 56 his advice for studying the Alexandrian schools, 56, 57 on the Canaanite wars, 58
 on 'Yeast,' 58
 on the characteristics of the first half of the present century, 59 writes to Kingsley regarding himself and Greg, 59 desires to have nothing to do with the Chartist-Socialist movement, 60

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.
 on the National Society, 60
 what the clergy might do if they would, 61 at Hastings—recollections of his sister Emma's death, 63 on utilising an institution at Stepney, 63, 64 his visit to Ulleswater, 65–67 his desire for the "spirit of a learner," 67 is the key-note of his life, 67 his studies as a student, 68 his mode of dealing with his fellow men, 69 his reverence for the opinions of minorities, 69 and contempt for "public opinion," 70 his defiance of the editor of the English Review, 70 and that of the Record, 70
 J. Wilson Croker's attack on him, 71–74
 a characteristic letter of, to Mr. Ludlow, 76
 Dr. Jelf's letter to, on his connection with Christian Socialism and with Kingsley, 78–80
 his reply to it, 80–82
 a further defence of himself, 83–86
 a committee of inquiry appointed, 86 his account of, and expectation of its decision, 86
 Dr. Jelf's letter to, conveying the report of the committee, 90 his reply, explaining what he and his friends meant by "Christian Socialism," 91–96 he is requested to apologise to King's College for having defended Kingsley, but declines, 98–100 he receives the resolutions of the Council of King's College, 100 the great strike in the iron trades, 103 his unwillingness to urge immediate co-operation on the men, 104–107 his comparison with the little boy and Gamaliel, 106 his idea of the importance of the trial of Hampden, 107 on Augustine and his influence on the modern world, 109–111 his anxiety as to the next step of the engineers on strike, 111 his dislike to discussions on capital and labour, 113 human relationships, not "capital" or

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.

- "labour," the basis of society, 113-116
- this his creed of association, 116
- his remarks on trades unions, 116
- his ideal is men, not measures, 118
- opposed to exacting Parliamentary pledges, 118, 119
- his admiration for Burke's speeches at Bristol, 119
- negotiates for the publication of 'Phaethon,' 123, 124
- letters to his sister Priscilla, and his Father and Mother, 124, 125
- his suppression of Lord Goderich's pamphlet, 125-130
- his views on monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy, 128-132
- literary criticism on 'Phaethon,' 132-136
- his vocation as a theologian is to show the influence of theology on all other studies, 136-138
- his distrust of death-bed stories, 139
- literary criticisms and suggestions on 'Hypatia,' 140-143
- becomes godfather to Tennyson's child, 143
- on the tendency to reaction in Unitarians, 143
- on Sabbath observance, 144
- on the effect of deep sorrow, 145
- his views on the Athanasian creed, 146-149
- dedicates his 'Prophets and Kings' to Mr. Erskine, 150
- the maxim of all his books—"God 'all in all,'" 151-153
- on the Articles, and his present views of subscription, 154
- preparing a book for Unitarians, 156
- success of his labours on behalf of co-operation, 156 et seq.
- on a new constitution for the co-operative society, 159
- publication of his 'Theological Essays,' 164
- an expression of his deepest thoughts, 164
- feels as if their publication would be a crisis in his life, 165
- on the composition of his 'Essays,' 167, 168
- and on the power of the Prayer-book, 168, 169
- on the consequences likely to result from the publication of his 'Essays,' 170
- his continual tendency to resign, 172

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.

- his correspondence with his friends regarding his dispute with the King's College authorities, 174 et seq.
- declines to resign—awaits dismissal 177, 178
- the real issue between Jelf and himself, 179, 180
- his impression as to a coming crisis in belief, 182
- Hare's view of the dispute with Jelf, 182-184
- his influence on his contemporaries, 184
- result to the Church if he is condemned, 184
- Colenso dedicates his Sermons to, 184
- Jelf's letter to the Council, and Maurice's reply, 186-190
- decision of the Council—dismissal, 190-192
- his own account of what took place at the meeting, 192-194
- unfair action of the principal and secretary, 200, 201
- Bishop of Oxford's "formula concordia," 201
- difficulties regarding his resignation, 202
- his feeling as to the Bishop of London's share in the matter, 202 and n.
- popular view of the case, 203
- final correspondence and resolution on the subject, 204-209
- the answer of public opinion and the press to the doings of the Council, 210-213
- letters to his friends on the subject, 213, 214
- severs his connection with Queen's College, 215
- letter from the committee of, to, 216
- presentation of a silver inkstand to, by the pupils of, 218
- explanation of his ideas as to time and eternity, 219
- influence of the word college on his mind, 220
- first idea of a "working men's college," 221
- address from the working men of London to, 221-223
- and from the members of Lincoln's Inn, 223
- his reply to the latter, on his principles of preaching, teaching, and learning, 225-228
- on the utility of Articles, 228

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.

- on revelation in the world and in the Bible, 229
- on one and many mediators, 229, 230
- on a Divine Spirit and a Mediator, 230
- desire to originate a series of 'Tracts for Priests and People,' 231, 232
- draws up a scheme for, and organizes, the Working Men's College, 233
- his estimate of the Evangelicals, 234
- peculiarity of his mode of writing, 235
- his motives frequently misunderstood, 235, 236
- how he acquired his knowledge of prevalent doubt and unbelief, 236
- Dr. Candlish's attack on him, 237
- his answer, 237 n.
- death of his mother and sister Priscilla, 238
- his reply to an address accompanying a present of books, 238
- produce of his lectures on behalf of the Working Men's College, 239
- on Mahomet, Atheism, and the Crimean war, 239
- on the occupations and nature of a future state, 242, 249
- delivers the inaugural address to the Working Men's College, 250
- lectures in Edinburgh and Glasgow, 250
- on "Nationalities" and England's part in history, 251
- his impressions of people in Edinburgh and Glasgow, 251
- on Bunsen, Niebuhr, and the anti-English school of thought, 251-253
- on the death of Hare, 255, 256
- on the Crimean war, and on that "true gospel preacher, Æschylus," 256
- on his book on Sacrifice and on Hare, 257, 258
- on the province of suffering and sorrow, 258
- delivers a series of lectures to ladies, 260
- on some doubts and difficulties, 260-264
- on the union of the spiritual with its manifestation, 264
- visits Germany, 265
- on national feeling and human feeling, 266
- his opinion of Goethe, 266
- on the Bible and Greek myths, 267
- on the true means of emancipating the nations, 269

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.

- on the doctrines of M. Talandier, 268-271
- on the Church Catechism, 271
- the Bible and the formularies of the Church, 272-274
- on the past and "nowadays," 275
- he preaches at Cambridge, 275
- his views on history and on the Civil Wars, 276-278
- on Carlyle as an historian, 277
- and on Cromwell, 277
- on another unity than the Adamic, 278
- his Introduction to Hare's Charges, 278, 279
- on his 'Moral Philosophy' and on Froude as an historian, 279
- his views on the Christian and the Jewish Sabbath, 280-283
- description of his home life and habits, 284-294
- his curious habit while dictating, 280
- contrast between his theories and practice with beggars, 287
- his health, personal appearance, and manners, 288-290
- his habit of fasting, 290
- his decision regarding Sunday walking, 290
- power of his personal influence, 291-293
- marvellous effect of his praying, 292, 293
- his manner when fired with a sense of wrong, 293, 294
- his pamphlet on the Sabbath-day, 294
- on Colenso's work in Africa, 295-297
- on Edwards, Knox, and the atonement, 298
- on the Inquirer, and on the Church of England, 299
- resumes his connection with Queen's College, 301
- his Lincoln's Inn sermons printed by subscription, 301
- on his book on the Gospel of St. John, 302
- his 'Moral Philosophy,' and the immense labour bestowed on it, 301-304
- his difficulties connected with the Working Men's College, 305-309
- his lectures on the Epistles of St. John and his antagonism to Mansel, 310-312
- on "strait is the gate," &c., 312
- thoughts on the Indian mutiny, 313

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.

- on the cold and formal prayers for the day of humiliation, 314
- his visit to Dr. Moberly, 314
- declines to stand for the preachiership of Lincoln's Inn, 315
- on the need for reformation in the teaching of the clergy, 316
- on the reformation of Calvinism, 317
- on the Sunday question at the Working Men's College, 318–321
- his aversion to anonymous periodical writing, 321
- two imaginary reviews of Froude, 322, 323
- on the "I" and the "We" as symbols of sectarianism in journalism, 324–326
- his view of the meaning of the word "Revelation," 328 et seq.
- his conception of preaching, 330
- Christ the image of God, 331
- the central point of his theology, 331
- points of difference between Mansel and, 332
- Dr. Jelf had failed to see the issue raised by; Mansel clearly realised it, 332
- effects produced by Mansel's lectures on, 333, 334
- his disadvantages in beginning the controversy, 335
- two stages of the controversy, 336, 337
- his effort to fight for truth against himself as much as against any one else tends to cause him to be misunderstood, 337, 338
- has the advantage in the later stages, 339
- change of opinion as to the merits of the question, 339
- incurs animosity for his resistance to Agnosticism, 339
- biographical importance of the controversy, 340, 341
- his views on eternal punishment and on the word "eternal," 341, 342
- his personal humility in controversy, 343, 344
- on the preaching of Spurgeon, 346
- on the existence of evil, 347
- on the three Persons in the Trinity and their actions on the spirit of man, 349–355
- on the Revision of the Prayer-Book, 356
- reasons against revising the Liturgy, 357–361

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.

- on the Act of Uniformity, 357–361
- appointed to St. Peter's, Vere Street, 361
- storm raised about this by the Record, 362
- the Bishop of London petitioned not to institute him, 363
- explanation of his principles and course in life, 364–368
- on the power and importance of the atonement, 365
- how he differs from Mansel and Jowett, 367
- a stranger's exposition of the view of, as to eternal punishment, 368, 369
- his reply approving this, 370
- address to, signed by 332 clergymen and 487 laymen, 371, 372
- his reply to it, 373–377
- reads himself in at St. Peter's, 377
- publishes two sermons preached at, 377
- engages in originating Working Men's College, 378
- saves a large amount of property, 378
- his practical difficulties with the Working Men's College, 379–381
- on the theology of the creeds against the world, 380
- his view of the storm raised by the 'Essays and Reviews,' 383
- danger of orthodoxy becoming a cover for atheism, 383
- on the principle of sacrifice, 384
- on toleration, 383–386
- toleration based on a certainty of truth, 384
- unbelief the cause of persecution, 385
- proposal for a series of 'Tracts for Priests and People,' 386
- criticism of the first draft of the scheme for them, 387
- on the doctrine of the Trinity and its definition, 388
- looks upon the 'Essays and Reviews,' as a genuine statement of confusions, but no settlement, 389, 390
- thinks that the unbelief shown in the answers to them is as terrible and more dangerous, because more popular, 390, 391
- on the 'Essays and Reviews' and the Quarterly reviewer's denunciation of them, 390, 391
- on the best mode of aiding the victory of Truth, 391, 392
- on the use and abuse of the Athanasian Creed, 392, 393

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.

on the fulness and perfection of Christ's sacrifice, 393-395
 the Communion for all—not for "the converted" only, 394
 the Jewish prophets, 395
 on Mill, 396
 on a son's studies, 396 on Dr. Lushington's judgment on Mr. Heath, 398 on the advantage of the Articles having been composed in the sixteenth century, 398 his view of the Jowett controversy at Oxford, 400 on inspiration, 401 publication of his 'Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy,' 402 on the personality of, and "belief" in, the devil, 402 on Mrs. Oliphant's 'Life of Irving,' 403 on Carlyle — a profound theocratic belief the basis of his mind, 404 on Irving as a theologian, 405 his contributions to 'Tracts for Priests and People,' 405 his feelings regarding Bishop Wilberforce, 406 his tract on 'The Grace of God,' and on kings reigning by it, 406 his autobiographical letter to Mr. Hutton, 406-409 on the Incarnation and Fall, 406, 407 on the redeeming power of Christ, 408 on a conversation of Mr. Jowett's, 410 on the self-contradiction of great and thoughtful men, 410 on the value of legends and facts, 411 on the Athanasian Creed, 412-417
 the true meaning of eternal, 413-414 on "lost souls," eternal life, and eternal death, 415 on the damnatory clauses of the creed, 416 on the Trinity as regarded by the Fathers and mediæval writers, 416 on the calling of the clergy, 417 and on that of the soldier, 417-420 on Ruskin, and on Colenso's "bewilderment," 421, 422 his interview with Colenso and its result, 422 his own account of it, 423
 as the result he resolves to resign Vere Street, 424 opposition of his friends to this, 425, 426

VOL. II.

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.

his answers to their remonstrances, 426-430 his views misunderstood by the public, 430
 the Bishop of London (Tait) opposed to it, 431 his resolution suddenly changed, 432-434 on the appointment of Trench to Dublin and Stanley to Westminster, 435, 436 publishes his 'Dialogues on Family Worship,' 436 proposes to write a series of letters on apologetic theological teaching 437 characteristic instance of his mode of treating other men, 437 his views on the American Civil War, 438-440 on Matthew Arnold and his essay on Spinoza, 441 controversy with Dr. Pusey regarding the prosecution of Mr. Jowett in the small debts Court, 442 correspondence with Father Newman on Tract XC., 442 on the Church and her position as the witness of a human union, 443 on the nature of God, and on Christ as the only escape from atheism, 444-448 on Juvenal, 448
 his opinion regarding Exodus and Genesis, 449 on the evidence for the Resurrection, 450 on Paley's 'Evidences,' 450 is requested to reply to Colenso, 451 does so in a series of letters, published as 'The Claims of the Bible and Science,' 451 his reading of the word "Revelation," 452 on the object and teaching of the Old Testament, 452 on miracles and myths, 453-455 attends the meetings at Mr. Kempe's rectory, 456 startling scene at one of the discussions, 457
 "on fire" at a mercenary view of the functions of the clergy, 457, 458 on Renan and on 'Romola,' 458 on commerce and Christianity, 459-461 on Renan, a Unitarian, and the Trinity, 461-463

3 A

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.

- on the nature of Renan's influence, 463-465
- contributes an article to Macmillan on Renan's 'Life of Jesus,' 465
- on the Christ of Renan, 465
- storm raised by the Privy Council decision in the cases of Williams and Wilson, 466
- "Declaration of Faith," put forth by the aggrieved parties, 467
- his Protest against the "Declaration," 468
- result of the response to the two appeals, 469
- on the meaning of "eternal" and "eternity," 471-473
- on the eternal and the temporal life, 473-477
- on eternal death, 476
- advice to an unbeliever, 477
- on Kingsley's dispute with Newman, 479
- his opinion of Kingsley's 'The Roman and the Teuton,' 479
- advice to a lady on some "tormenting thoughts," 479-482
- on the meaning and teaching of the Athanasian Creed, 482
- is opposed to removing it from the Prayer-Book, 484
- declines to meet Bishop Colenso, 485
- but defends him in the Times against the Bishop of Capetown's prosecution, 486, 487
- elected a member of the Juridical Society, 487
- advice to a clergyman in South Africa as to how he should treat Colenso, 487-491
- on subscription, 491
- on Lord Ebury's bill as to the Prayer-Book, 492
- on theology—God in the Living Word, 493
- on sacraments as the means of Revelation, 494-496
- on baptism into the Divine Name, 495, 496
- on inspiration and the Word of God, 499-501
- on the preaching of God as the deliverer, 501
- regards Protestantism as unfriendly to art, favourable to science, 502
- on subscription and the Articles, 503-507
- his appreciation of Robertson's 'Life and Letters,' 508

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.

- on the general unbelief as to God's influencing nations or their policy, 509-511
- on the prevalent worship of mere testimony, 510
- on Butler and his 'Analogy,' 510
- on the book called 'Ecce Homo,' 511
- on his position toward the Record, 514
- and the nature and falsity of its attacks on him, 515, 516
- on Pusey's 'Eirenicon' and Newman's 'Letter,' 517
- on the spirit and scope of the 'Eirenicon,' 519-519
- reads a paper before the Juridical Society on bribery at elections, 520
- advocates the transfer of the trial of election petitions to the judges, 520
- on the force and meaning of the words 'eternal life,' 520-523
- on the possibility of sorrow in heaven, 523
- on some Methodist preachers wishing to join the Church, 524
- on the Church as a universal fellowship, 524
- the heaven to learn to think of, 525
- quaint misunderstandings of him, 526
- difficulty of classifying a man who positively refuses to be classified, 527
- he is dubbed a Broad Churchman by some, 527
- one source of supposed knowledge of him—the attacks of so-called religious newspapers, 526, et seq.
- respect in which he was held by people in all parts of the world, 527
- confusion produced by the conflicting ideas of him, 528
- effects of the popular misconception of him on the faith of the time, 528
- how it became convenient for drawing-room purposes "not to understand him," 529
- certain elements in his writings which tended to produce this, 530
- difficulty of defining his place on the principle of dividing the world into "those who are right" and "those who have gone wrong," seeing that his life's protest was against that division, 531
- other elements in his character which lead to misunderstanding, 532-534
- anecdote of one phase of "public opinion" regarding him, 534

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.

an instance of Punch's dealing with him, 535
 Mr. Leslie Stephen's misconception of, 535, 536 his objection to learned, scientific, and literary "saints," 536 had learned lessons at sick-beds no learning could teach, 536
 Mr. Ellis's and Mr. M'Leod Campbell's strange misconception of, 537-541 the assertions of both utterly groundless, 538-541
 the guilt of sin a tremendous reality was a fact he was continually inculcating, 539-541 instances of this from his works, 540 his mode of studying an author, 541 n.
 and method of ascertaining the meaning they attach to the special words they used, 541 n.
 his state of feeling in 1866, 542 becomes a candidate for the Professorship of Moral Theology and Moral Philosophy at Cambridge, 544 the works put forward as his claim, 544 is elected to the Professorship at Cambridge, 545 receives congratulations from all quarters, 545 reflections on the "moral courage" of the electors, 546 his own feelings on the subject, 547, 548 his opinion of Mazzini, 548
 severs his constant connection with the Working Men's College, 549-551 farewell meeting at, and memorable speeches, 550 delivers his inaugural lecture at Cambridge, 552 his own account of it, and of his reception, 552 continues to preach at Vere Street, 553
 the fatigue of the double duty tells on him, 553 his lectures and sermons at Cambridge, 553 his venerable personal appearance at this period, 554 Kingsley's account of him, 554 his remark regarding Leonardo da Vinci's St. John, 554

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.

establishes the "Girls' Home" at Vere Street, 555 on the sacrifice of Christ, and the mode of accepting it, 555-557 on Gladstone's face, and what it indicates, 557 on Democracy and Aristocracy, 557-559 on Christ as the High-priest of humanity, 559 on His "joy" on earth and in heaven, 559 on being in Christ, 560
 St. Paul's view of the order of the Resurrection, 561 conscience the starting point of his moral instruction, 562
 on the meaning and teaching of the Athanasian Creed, 563 on his view of hell, 564 his appeal to Scripture and the Articles as to the effect of Christ's death, 566-569 life not death after "this life," 569 on the Catholic faith and popular heresies, 570-572 the substitution of Dogma for God, the tendency of the time, 571 on faith and trust—Christ in God, and man in God's righteousness manifested in Christ, 572-574 on God guiding this age and all in it, 574 on the Kingdom of Heaven, 575 on his Hope sermons, Disraeli's premiership, and the fall of the Irish Church, 576 on the conscience—the man himself, 577 on an article on the Christian aspects of Comtism, 578 on the illness and death of a friend's mother, 579 on the Protestant and Roman faith, 580-583 contributes a series of letters to the Daily News on Church and State, 584 explanation of what he means by the union of Church and State, 585 the State conservative of property—the Church "communistic," 586 reflections on the death of a young lady, 587 on recognition in heaven, 587 on Louis XI. and Calvin, 589-590 on the nature of a Sacrament, 590

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.

on the injurious effects of competitive examination, 591–593 he resigns his charge at Vere Street, 593 his farewell sermon, 593, 594 men of all political and religious parties regular attendants at Vere Street, 595 peculiarity of his position in the Church, 595 on the meaning of the word “Revelation,” 597 ‘Meditations and Prayers’ on the Church, 597 his work on ‘National Morality,’ 597 on Locke, Kant, and Mill, 598 supports female suffrage in the Spectator, 598 corresponds with Mill on the subject, 598 is assumed by Mr. L. Stephen to be a Broad Churchman, 599 and represented as holding a mixture of opinions, some his own, some utterly inconsistent with his own, 599, 600 his regard for, and his opinion of, Dean Stanley, 601 his refusal of the leadership of the Liberal clergy, 601
 the pain he felt at Dean Stanley’s accepting it, 601 his relationship to Stanley, and of both to Liberal Churchmen brought to a crucial test, 602 his letter on Mr. W. G. Clark’s pamphlet, 602 explains why no dogma on the infallibility of the Scriptures appears in the Articles, 602 on the reverence of Luther and the Reformers for the Scriptures, and for St. Paul, 602, 603 explains his view of, and defends, the Articles, 603 as the groundwork of a more comprehensive humanity and a more spiritual theology than was possible in the 16th century, 603 instance of how he was often misunderstood, 604 what he really said in reference to the Articles, 604 his explanation to Dean Stanley, 605 motives of his repudiation of the title Broad Churchman, 606 his protest against the term, 607 n.

MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.

his intense love of truth, and readiness to recognise it everywhere, 608 his attitude towards the scientific agnostics, 608 his views on secular and denominational education, 610 on some merits and defects of Mill’s, 610 on the prosecution of Bennett, 614 his article in the Contemporary on Newman’s ‘Grammar of Assent,’ 615 public agitation to obtain him Church promotion, 616 his sentiments on the subject, 616, 617 on English torpor and money worship, 617
 Have the departed a knowledge of those who remain behind? — his answer to the question, 619–626 on “disembodied spirits,” 623 apparitions, 624
 ministering angels, 624 and death as the bond of communion between heaven and earth, 625 on Ritualism and the Ritualists, 626 his health much impaired, 627 a member of the Royal Commission on the Contagious Diseases Acts, 627 accepts the stipendless living of St. Edward’s, Cambridge, 627 his reasons for accepting it, 628 his delight in his little grandson, 628, 635, 636 his mode of teaching little children, 629
 his dealing with the undergraduates, 630 his consideration for others and disregard of himself, 630 his home life as an old man, 631 his intense desire for unity, 632 his views on the Purchas and Voysey judgments, 632 his good-bye to the Working Men’s College, 633 undertakes the Cambridge Preacher-ship at Whitehall, 635 his last visit to Oxford, 635 continues to preach at Cambridge and in London, 635
 the extra work tells fatally on him, 635 his last public appearances, 636 and last illness, 636 is removed to London, 636
 resigns St. Edward’s, Cambridge, 636

- MAURICE, F. D.—Vol. ii.
 his last days, 636–641
 his death, 641
 and burial, 642 public feeling on the subject, 642, 643
- Maurice, Anne, i. 8; change in her religious views, 20, 22; her letter to her father on the subject, 23; believes herself persecuted, 27; her domestic charges, 27; selects Mr. Foster, the essayist, as her guide in spiritual matters, 28; her death, 70; her papers published, 131
- Maurice, Emma, i. 8; her illness and remarkable recovery, 17, 18; her influence on Maurice, 30, 31; her character, 31; never properly a Unitarian, 31; illness of, and her marvellous self-denial, 98; her enthusiastic letter to her brother regarding his novel, 104; her views on the Irvingite “miracles,” 117; her last illness, 123; and death, 124; her papers published, 131; Maurice on her character, 178; his remembrance of her death, ii. 63
- Maurice, Elizabeth, i. 8; change in her religious views, 20; believes herself persecuted, 27; her domestic duties, 27; passes under the influence of a clergyman of the Church of England, 28; becomes a companion to Miss Gladstone, 108; letter to, from her brother on his sister Emma’s death, 124; her change of feeling towards Dissenters, 126; her death, 264; nature and effect of her influence on her brother, 264
- Maurice, Lucilla (afterwards Mrs. Powell), i. 27
- Maurice, Mary, i. 8; change in her religious views, 20; takes charge of one of her younger sisters, 27; selects Mr. Foster, the essayist, as her spiritual guide, 28; practical nature of her character, 28; decides to study the Pestalozzian system, 99; effect on her of her father’s loss of fortune, 127; joins the Church of England, 127
- Maurice, Esther, i. 27; her resemblance to her sister Emma, 385; her marriage to Archdeacon Hare, 386. See Hare, Mrs. Julius.
- Maurice, Priscilla, i. 8; letters to, from her brother, 57, 106, 107; scolds her brother for not denouncing the Irvingite “miracles,” 118; letter to, from him, giving his views on the subject and on light, 118–120; another letter from him on Mr. Erskine, 121; is informed of her brother’s intention to be baptised, 123; takes charge of his house at Bubbenhall, 153, 161; and at Guy’s Hospital, 198; her rejoinder to a remark of her brother’s, 198; her illness—conceals it from her brother, 207; at Carlyle’s lectures, 282; letters to, 405, 409, 412–415; her illness, ii. 63; letters to, from Maurice, 124, 155, 164–166; her death, 238
- Maurice, William, i. 8
- Maurice, Mrs. F. D., visits her sister at Hastings, i. 255; letters to, from her husband, 255–257; writes to Georgiana Hare regarding her husband’s ‘Lectures on Education,’ 270; and his election as Professor at King’s College, 283; letters to, from her husband, 291–294, 298, 300, 309, 310, 321, 323; death of her uncle and elder sister, 336; her assiduous attention to Sterling, 347, 363, 366, 376; her illness and death, 403–410; burial in Hurstmonceux churchyard, 406. See also Barton, Anna.
- Maurice, Mrs. F. D., letters to, ii. 63, 255, 258, 314, 519, 520; her account of her husband’s last days, ii. 636–641. See also Hare, Miss G.
- Maurice family, singular fatality of the season of Easter to the, i. 366, 520; ii. 639–641
- Mayhew, Mr. H., his articles on “London labour and the London poor,” ii. 13
- Maynooth, Maurice’s view of the grant to, i. 436–443
- Maryland, State of, Maurice saves his money invested in the funds of, ii. 378
- Mazzini, reference to, ii. 548
- ‘Meditations and Prayers,’ on the Church, ii. 597
- Melanchthon, ii. 615
- ‘Memorials of Two Sisters,’ Emma and Anne Maurice, i. 131
- Melbourne’s (Lord) Ministry, Maurice’s opinion of, i. 277; arrange with the National Society regarding education, 285
- Merivale, Mr., a candidate for the chair of Political Economy at Oxford, i. 210; references to, ii. 60, 615
- Metaphysical reading, on a course of, i. 463 et seq.
- Metropolitan Quarterly Magazine,*

- Maurice's contributions to the, i. 61-69
- Middle Ages, on the, i. 367; on the idea of a spiritual bridegroom in the, 446; Kingsley's knowledge of the, 462; Carlyle on, 462; influence of Mahomet upon, ii. 239
- Mill, James, his 'Analogy of the Human Mind,' i. 202
- Mill, John Stuart, his account of Maurice's connection with the Metropolitan Quarterly Magazine, i. 61; and of his contributions to the Westminster Review and joining the London Debating Society, 74; his (Mill's) connection with it, 76; Maurice on his acquaintance with, 178; his article on Bentham, 252; Maurice's opinion of, 252; reference to, 504; his evidence on co-operative associations, ii. 52; assails Mansel, 340; on a book of his, and his interpretation of the universe without God, 396; his article in Fraser on the union of the United States, 440; Maurice's recollections of, as a human being, not as a metaphysician, 496; Maurice's appreciation of the book on Sir W. Hamilton, 498; his election prospects, and kind note to Maurice, 499; confuses the sensual and the logical, 598; corresponds with Maurice on the subject of female suffrage, 598; on certain intellectual merits and defects of, 610
- Miller, Hugh, dines with Maurice, ii. 251
- Milman. See St. Paul's, Dean of.
- Milnes, Mr. Monckton (afterwards Lord Houghton), i. 436
- Milner, i. 217
- Millenarians, on the, i. 107; ii. 243, 244
- Millenium, Maurice's views on the, i. 208. (N.B., in text "Millennium" by error.)
- Minorities, Maurice's reverence for the opinions of, ii. 69
- "Miracles," Irvingite, discussed, i. 116 et seq.; Maurice's views on the subject, 118-120
- Miracles, on, ii. 453-455
- Moberley, Dr., Maurice's visit to, ii. 314
- 'Modern Europe,' i. 37
- Modern History, rough notes of some lectures on, i. 473
- Monarchy, Maurice's views on, i. 485; ii. 128-132, 406, 497
- Montalembert and the priest party, on the triumph of, ii. 97
- Montesquieu, i. 63, 225, 467
- Montgomery's, 'Pelican Island,' i. 74
- Moods, misery of dependence on, i. 515
- Moore, the Poet, i. 78
- 'Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy,' first preparation of, i. 185, 275, 279, 280; how the habit of writing shown in was formed, 337; allusion to the mediæval portion of, ii. 279; on various estimates of the value of, and immense labour bestowed on it, 302-304; publication of, 402; reference to, 544; habitual plunder from without acknowledgment, ii. 547
- Moral Philosophy, lectures on, at Guy's, i. 197
- 'Moral and Popular Tales,' Miss Edgeworth's, i. 17
- More, Sir Thomas, i. 217
- Morning Chronicle*, the, ii. 13, 28, 35, 108
- Mosheim, i. 217
- Moslem philosophers, on, ii. 278
- Myths, on, ii. 268, 453; the theory of the Mythical School, ii. 454

N

- NAME, we have forgotten the, i. 219; on the Eternal, 449; which is to bind together all nations, ii. 89, 494; on baptism into the, 495, 496
- Napoleon, Louis, on the triumph of, ii. 97
- Nation, exists in the acknowledging of the Righteous God, i. 141; has the Church or the State the power to educate the Nation, 269; the English v. a poor imitation Popedom, i. 491
- Nations, on our duty to, ii. 251; each nation must work out its own salvation, 252; a native of one country cannot properly understand the wants of those of another, 252; on the true means of emancipating the nations, 269; the freedom of, depends on the bringing home to men of their spiritual condition as actually existing in the Living Word, 272; on unbelief as to God's influencing the, or their policy, 510.
- 'National Apostasy,' Mr. Keble's sermon on, in 1833, the overt commencement of the Oxford movement, i. 160
- National life, importance of a true knowledge of, i. 203; a crisis in, has always produced poets, 204
- National education, state of, and agitation for, in 1839, i. 269; Maurice's views on, 277; opposed to the State controlling, 277; subsequent views, 286, 432-434, 544-547; ii. 24, 60, 61, 610-613

National Society for the education of the poor in the principles of the Established Church, foundation of the, i. 273; connection of the Educational Magazine with the, 273; Government agreement with the, 285; Maurice's account of a meeting of, 544, 545; his reflections on, 546, ii. 24; on the effete condition of, 60

Nature, Maurice's thoughts on, i. 281; ii. 260, &c., 274

Neale, Mr. Vansittart, joins the Council of Promoters, ii. 75; and becomes joint trustee of a trading company, 75; still connected with co-operation, 157, n.; acquires the chief influence, 220; reference to, 232

'Neal's History of the Puritans,' influence of, on the mind of Maurice, i. 19

Neander, i. 217; Hare defends him, 249; Maurice apologises for speaking flipantly of him, 249

'Nemesis of Faith,' Maurice on Froude's, i. 516-519

Neo-Platonism, ii. 140

Newman, F. W., author of various works, references to, i. 381; ii. 59, 333 n.; Maurice's reasons for refusing joint teaching with, 469-471; his work on the Hebrew monarchy, 470

Newman, J. H. (afterwards Cardinal), at Oxford, i. 115; reference to his 'Apologia pro Vitâ Suâ,' 147 n.; reference to, 162; how Maurice regarded him at Oxford, 182; his controversy with Dr. Hampden, 191; reference to, 214; his Tract XC. and the protest of the four Tutors, 238; on his 'Theory of Development,' 422-424, 430; his views on Mahomet, ii. 239; his editing of the British Critic, 325; reference to, 437; his letter in answer to Maurice regarding Tract XC., 442; his dispute with Kingsley, 478; looks not to the ascended Christ as the bond of communion, and therefore defends Mariolatry, 517; Maurice's article on the 'Grammar of Assent,' of, 615; cause of the bitter dislike of, for Luther, 615

Newmanic theory, the, its permanent influence on Froude, i. 518

Newmanism, i. 517

"New School of Cockneyism," the, i. 62

Newspapers, religious. See Religious newspapers.

New Testament, characteristics of the books of the, i. 253-255; announces the power of the Spirit, ii. 352

'New Testament, the Unity of the,' i. 482; ii. 452

Nicene Creed, how Maurice accepted the belief expressed in, ii. 444

Nicolay, Mr. (misspelt Nicholay in text), his letter to the Record about Kingsley, ii. 51

Niebuhr, i. 217; Buckland's opinion of, 420; defects on his comments on England, ii. 252; his influence on the study of history, 509

Noel, Mr. Baptist, i. 107

Norgrove, Betsy, Maurice's old nurse, her anecdotes of his childhood, i. 32, 33

Normanstone, Lowestoft, the birthplace of F. D. Maurice, i. 8, 10

O

OCCAM, William of, on the writings of, i. 466; Maurice's visit to village, ii. 355

Old Testament, the, the dictionary of the New, i. 107; two aspects of, 497; revealed neither the Father nor the Son as such, ii. 352; on the object and teaching of the, 452; the three aspects under which it was contemplated in the last century, 454; the great barrier against ecclesiastical oppression, 490

'Old Testament, Prophets and Kings of the,' ii. 150, 452

'Old Testament, Patriarchs and Lawgivers of the,' ii. 53, 452

Orders, on taking, under a sense of inadequate intensity of feeling, i. 245-248

Orders, Maurice considers the question of taking, i. 93, 94; see also i. 139, 145, 152; on men of talent taking, ii. 53

Ordination, service, Maurice's view of the, i. 152; his feelings on the evc of being ordained, 158; his answers at, 159; on ordinations and weddings, 500

Ordinances, on the fate of, i. 342

Oratory, Maurice's dread of, ii. 3; his occasional eloquence a very different thing, 3; instances of this, 3, 4

Orthodox faith, Maurice's answer to the charge of departing from the, ii. 225
 "Orthodoxy," a retrospect of English, i. 308; Mansel's view of, ii. 335
 Owen, Mr. and the socialist movement, i. 75; the mouthpiece of discontent, 268; reference to, ii. 92
 Oxford, Maurice's first term at, i. 102; undergraduate and early graduate life at, chap. ix. and x.; his recollections of, in 1831, 179; subscription required from every student at matriculation at, 180; on the system of subscription at, 181; proposed as professor of political economy at, 210; see also 213, 214; withdraws from contest, 222, 223; controversy at, regarding Ward's book, 390; proposed new statutes at, 391; they are withdrawn, 400; Mr. Ward deprived of his degree at, 401; Maurice on Gladstone's candidature at, 434; Maurice's son an undergraduate at, ii. 396; the Jowett controversy at, 400; meeting in the music-hall at, 467; Disraeli's speech at, 492; Gladstone's defeat at, 499; thoughts on revisiting, 520; Maurice's last visit to, 635
 "Oxford movement," commencement of the, i. 160; Maurice on the, 161-163; his account of the rise of, 180; feeling against the, 185 et seq.; Baptism one of the points of the, 203; on the spirit of, 205; his deprecation of, 206; importance of Dr. Pusey's joining the, 213, 214. See High Church Party.
 Oxford tutors, protest of four, against the doctrine taught in Tract XC., i. 238

P

PAINE, TOM, reference to, i. 385; ii. 80
 Paley's 'Evidences,' Maurice's opinion of, ii. 450
Pall Mall, references to the, ii. 616, 633
 Palmerston, Lord, ii. 362
 Palm Sunday and Passion week, reflections on, i. 534, 535
 Palmer of Magdalen, "paradoxical letter" of, i. 321, 325; his article in the English Review, 504, 521; ii. 70
 "Pan-Anglican" Conference, the, at Lambeth, ii. 565; on a phrase in the encyclical letter of, 566; reference to, ii. 614
 Pantheism, Carlyle's, i. 282, 283, 284
 Papacy, the, and Protestantism, i. 140-142, 187; and 320 to 327
 Parables and expressions of Christ, Maurice's habitual mode of referring to, i. 334 n.
 Parker, J. W., i. 481
 Parker, Miss Esther, governess in Michael Maurice's family, i. 18; changes her religious views, 30
 'Parents' Assistant,' Miss Edgeworth's, i. 17
 Parliament, Maurice opposed to exacting pledges from men sent to, i. 443, ii. 118; on the admission of Jews to Parliament, i. 445
 Parmenides, on his conception of a God, ii. 441, 449
 Pascal, i. 63
 Passion week, reflections on, i. 534, 535
 'Patriarchs and Lawgivers of the Old Testament,' the, ii. 53, 452
 "Peace I leave with you," Maurice on the phrase, i. 497
 Peel, Sir Robert, i. 179, 180; his treatment of Cornelius, 320; introduces and carries the Dissenters' Chapels Bill, 435, 436
 Pelagius, ii. 110
 Pentateuch, Colenso on the, ii. 421 et seq.; Sir T. Acland's two questions to Maurice on the, 451; Maurice's view of the teaching of the, 452
 "Pelican Island," Montgomery's, Maurice's article on, i. 74
 People's College at Sheffield, the notice of, ii. 232
People, the, the organ of the Sunday League, ii. 319, 320
 Perceval, Mr., assassination of, i. 16
 Persecution, unbelief the cause of, ii. 385, 386
 Pestalozzi, i. 81
 Pillow, Maurice's curious habit of hugging a, ii. 286
 Pindar's Elysium, ii. 523
 Pitt, i. 66
 Pharisees, the, the "Party of Progress," ii. 571
 Philips, Rev. E., letters to, from Maurice, ii. 402
 Philo, on the study of, ii. 57
 Philosophical reading, on a course of a, i. 463-469; ii. 37-39
 'Philosophy, Moral and Metaphysical.' See 'Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy.'
 Philostratus's life of Apollonius of Tyana, the value of, ii. 57
 Plato, Hare's exposition of the 'Gorgias'

- of, i. 54; references to, 81, 199, 217, 275; on the writings of, 465; on the value of the writings of, ii. 37; Plato the best commentator on, 37; on the use of helps in studying, 37, 38; on the merits of Schleiermacher and Cousin as guides to, 38; on the relative excellences of Aristotle and, 38, 39, 436; reference to, 541 n.
- Platonists, all little children are, i. 207
- Pledges from men sent to Parliament, Maurice opposed to exacting, i. 433; ii. 118
- Plotinus, the Enneads of, ii. 56
- Plumptre, Rev. Edward (afterwards Dean of Wells), i. 534; reference to, ii. 176
- 'Poets, on the Prose of,' i. 69; as due to vigorous national life, 204
- 'Politics for the People,' the series of tracts so called, i. 461, 463; the first number issued, 471; nature of the contents of, 472; extract from an article on 'Fraternity' in, 473; list of contributors to, 475; the working men and, 482; circulation of, 483
- Pollock, Sir F., ii. 432 n.
- Popery, anti-national and anti-catholic, i. 140-142, 187; versus Catholicism, 321
- Porter, Mr., Mr. Gladstone's mention of a sermon by, i. 109
- Powles, Mr. Maurice's letter to, on Gladstone's candidature at Oxford, i. 436-443
- Praise, on, as an act of will due to an assurance of God's will, i. 530
- Pratt, Hodgson, his labour on behalf of co-operation, ii. 162
- Prayer Book, sermons on the, i. 497, 501; on the, and its uses, 512; Maurice accused of not believing in the doctrines of the, 522; on its influence on himself and the world, ii. 163, 169; its importance as a protection against religious newspapers, 214; "on the revision of the, and the Act of Uniformity," 356; on Lord Ebury's Bill regarding the, 492; the, not exclusive, 570. See also Catechism. ‡
- Prayer, Maurice a man of much, i. 205; Mrs. Maurice's testimony to this, ii. 285 n.; the atonement the subject of all, 365; on the nature and power of, 446
- Prayers, on cold and formal, ii. 314
- Preaching, Maurice's conception of, ii. 330; the atonement should be the main subject of all, 365
- Preaching, teaching, and learning, Maurice's defence of his principles of, ii. 225-228
- Presbyterianism, the Act of Uniformity creates a new, i. 1; distinction between English and Scotch, 2; on the Scots setting up, as a basis for a union with England, ii. 278
- Presbyterians, origin, influence, and doctrines of the Puritan, i. 1; the body of them created by the Act not positively opposed to episcopacy, 2; averse to all formal expressions of creed, 2; this fact the special mark of English, 2; a final form of creed the distinctive mark of Scotch, 2; excitement amongst English, caused by one of them declaring himself a Socinian, 2; great meeting of Baptists, Independents, and, at Salters' Hall, to consider the subject, 3; they refuse to bind themselves by any form of creed, 3; and adopt a resolution which expresses the spirit of Presbyterianism at the time, 3, 4; causes tending towards a change of belief, 4; they inherit a tendency to speak of one God, 4; effects of the Calvinistic creed in producing a repulsion against the idea of a divided Godhead, 4; all who refused to be bound by formulæ, join them, 4; influence of the indifference and scepticism of the 18th century on, 4, 5; spirit of the new apostles who join them, 4, 5; two of whom—Priestley and Belsham—all but formulated a creed for them, 5; effects of this on a large body of the, 5; and on the belief and education of those who cherished the old Puritan traditions, 5; thus they become largely permeated by Unitarianism, 6, 7; and finally become wholly Unitarians, 7; this ultimately leads to the passing of the Dissenters' Chapels Bill, 434-436
- 'Present Day Papers,' the Bishop of Argyll's proposal to issue a series of, ii. 516; Maurice is asked to contribute to, 516. See also 615 and 615 n.
- Priestley joins the Presbyterians, effect of this on their belief, i. 5; proceeds to America, 8; effect of his treatment in embittering Unitarianism, 9; his "Lectures," 37
- Prince Albert, his desire to obtain a fitting occupant for the Divinity Chair at Cambridge, ii. 14; quotation of a phrase of his, 535

- Privy Council reverse Dr. Lushington's judgment in the cases of Williams and Wilson, ii. 466; list of the members of the Judicial Committee of in 1864, 466
- Promoters. See Council of Promoters.
- Prophecies, Mr. Stephenson's views on the, i. 150.
- 'Prophets and Kings of the Old Testament, the,' ii. 150, 452
- Prophets, on the study of the, i. 224
- Proselytiser, Maurice "a bad," ii. 337
- "Protestant Church," on the term, i. 325
- Protestantism, on, and the Papacy, i. 140-142; Protestantism not predicable of a Church, 141; only of a nation, 141; its duty and that of the Catholic Church, 187, 319, 320; on a progress beyond, 339; on right and wrong ways of supporting, 342, 345; remarks on, in connection with Gladstone's candidature at Oxford, 437; unfavourable to art, favourable to science, ii. 502; the battle of, best fought amongst young men, 552; on Romanism as contrasted with, 580-583; effects on, of substituting assent to the doctrine of justification for belief in the Justifier, 615
- Protestant Sisters of Charity at Guy's, i. 296
- 'Protestant, Thoughts on the Duty of a, in the Present Oxford Election,' i. 443
- Protestants and Romanists, the battle-cry that will rally, ii. 317
- Protest against proposed new statutes at Oxford, Maurice's desire for a, i. 391 et seq.
- Protheroe, Mr. i. 35
- Providence, on the voice of, i. 139
- Prussia, visit of the King of, to England, i. 324; Maurice's view of the position and conduct of the King of, 484-487, 542
- 'Public opinion,' Maurice regards the worship paid to as the great idolatry of the time, ii. 70
- 'Public opinion' regarding Maurice, anecdote of one phase of, ii. 534.
- Punch*, its dealing with Maurice, ii. 535
- Punishment, eternal. See Eternal punishment
- 'Punishments, Rewards and,' i. 275
- Pupils of King's College, Maurice's letter to, ii. 213; and to those of Queen's College, 218
- Purchas judgment, the, Maurice's view of, ii. 632
- Puritans, love of the, for the God of the Old Testament, i. 4; traditions of the, 5; life of the, 6; on the spirit of the during the Civil Wars, ii. 276
- Pusey, Dr., his apology for German theologians, i. 180; how Maurice regarded him at Oxford, 182; his tract on Baptism, 182; it becomes the parting point between Maurice and the Oxford school, 186, 188; Maurice on the tracts on Baptism of, 205; his Tracts on Baptism the true representative note of the High Church party as a party, 213; difference betwixt the views of, on Baptism and those of Maurice, 213, 214; his breach with; Maurice, and his estimate of the cause, 221, 237; one of the main issues between Maurice and, 326; restrained from preaching in the University pulpit for two years, 342; Maurice's prophecy in regard to, 344; Miss Sellon and, 504; his prosecution of Mr. Jowett, ii. 442; controversy of Maurice with, regarding, 442; considers Genesis 'the Divine Psalm of Creation,' 449; his letter to the Record, 467; his controversy with Maurice on the 'Declaration of Faith,' 468; what his theology teaches, 473; thoughts regarding, on reading his 'Eirenicon,' 517; on the spirit of the 'Eirenicon,' 517-519; his 'Confessional,' 552; the substitution of Dogma for God the characteristic of, and his school, 571
- Pygmalion's mistake, on a husband committing, i. 478
- Pythagoras, i. 275

Q

- QUAKER houses and graveyard at Frenchay, i. 10
- 'Quaker, Letters to a,' i. 212, 214
- Quaker, Maurice's letter to a, for Churchmen, its object, i. 212; letter to a, on Baptism, 214; on the difference between the old and the younger Quakers, 237; on the function of a true, ii. 500
- Quarterly Review*, White's article in, on early Protestant reformers in Spain, i. 51; article on Queen's College in number of, for July 1878, 456; denunciation in March, 1850, of the lectures delivered at Queen's College, ii. 51; J. Wilson Croker's attack on Maurice in, 71-74, 84; Lockhart's disgust at, 71 n.

Queen's College, birth of, i. 455, 456; on a union between the professors of University College and those of, 469-471; Maurice's lectures at, 502; denunciation of the lectures delivered at, ii. 51; Maurice's letter to the Bishop of London in defence of, and resigns for a time the chairmanship of, but resumes it, 54; Mr. Ludlow drafts a charter for, 121; Maurice's remarks on, 121; he severs his connection with, 215; letter of regret from the Committee of, to Maurice, 216; presentation of a silver inkstand to Maurice by the pupils of, 218; he resumes his connection with, 301

R

RADCLIFFE, Dr., his generous treatment of Maurice, ii. 593; attends him in his last illness, 636, 640, 641

Radical starting point in politics, the, i. 485

Radstock, Lord, ii. 187, 200

Ragged boys, account of a day in the country with, i. 548

Rationalism, Schelling and Cousin's antidote to, i. 289

Read, Mr., editor of the Morning Post, at Oxford, i. 162

Read, Mr., letter to, from Maurice, ii. 626

Reading, representative authors in a course of, i. 217; on the order of, 224; on a course of metaphysical and philosophical, 463-469; in reading study only the great works, not digests, 469; on a course of philosophical, ii. 37-39

'Recollections and Confessions of William Milward, a Chartist,' i. 473

Record newspaper, Maurice's feud with, i. 243, 244; its attacks on him, 515; on the evil wrought by the, 532; feeling of an old pupil of Maurice's at the dastardly attacks of the, ii. 11, 12; Maurice's defiance of the editor of the, 70; a travestie of current public opinion, 78; plays on Dr. Jelf's fears, 164; references to, 169, 175, 182, 184, 193, 200; Dr. Jelf's connection with and repudiation of, 211 n.; Maurice acknowledges a debt of gratitude to, 234; storm raised by the, on Maurice's appointment to St. Peter's, Vere Street, 362; its influence with Evangelicals, 362; and misrepresentation of Maurice's views, 363; other clerical journals take their cue from, 368; termination of the reign of tyranny of the, 370-372; its attacks on Robertson's 'Life and Letters,' 512; character of the writers of these attacks, 512; Mr. King desires to expose them, 512; Maurice opposed to this—explains his own position towards the writers in the, 513; references to, 528, 529, 617

Red Lion Square, a school for, ii. 65

Redemption and the Fall, comparative extent of, i. 189

"Redemption," on the power of the Word, i. 520; God's redemption of all mankind, ii. 15-23; redemption by God alone the maxim of all Maurice's books, 151-153

Reformers, their view of the meaning of the Thirty-Nine Articles, i. 396

Relationships, on, as an ascending and descending ladder between the human and the divine, i. 126, 127, 131; the divine becomes the centre of all his preaching, 236; after this almost all letters contain some reference to this; see especially ii. 113-116, 271-275

"Religion," distinction made by Maurice between "theology" and, i. 86

Religion against God the heresy of the age, i. 518

'Religions of the World,' the, i. 431

Religious newspapers, Maurice's attack upon before any had attacked him, i. 241-244; Maurice tries to sever Lord Ashley from, 343; their first attack on him follows, 353; attacks on Maurice by, 451; effects of those attacks, ii. 11, 12; list of those that had spoken favourably of Christian socialism, 85; they welcome Mansel as the great champion of orthodoxy, 339; untruthfulness of their statements as to views they oppose, 368; effects of their attacks on Maurice, 526 et seq.; base nature of the anonymous writing in so-called, 546

Religious systems, popular English, Maurice's views of, i. 522

"Religious" writers, on the morals of so called, ii. 50, 51 and n., 70

Reminiscences, Sir E. Strachey's, of the everyday life of Maurice at Guy's Hospital, i. 198 et seq.

Renan, remarks on, ii. 458, 461, 462; estimate of the influence of his book, 463-465; on the Christ of, 465; his Jesus the Jesus of the Jesuits, 466

- Resurrection, on the, i. 540; on the evidence for the, ii. 450
- "Revelation," Maurice's reading of the word, ii. 452; must bear a different meaning from what it does in the phrase "revealed religion," 511
- Revelation, the Book of, Maurice's view of, i. 208; ii. 637
- Revelation, the difficulty in the present day is to believe in a, i. 340; on the meaning of, ii. 328 et seq.; the knowledge of God in Christ the object of all, 328; meaning of the word, 597; paper on, by Maurice, 616
- 'Revelation, The, of St. John the Divine, ii. 452
- 'Revelation? What is,' Maurice's reply to Mansel, ii. 336; extracts from, 338, 341; sequel to, 340; extract from, 343; unfavourable reviews of, 348
- 'Revelation? What is,' ii. 544; 'Sequel to,' 544
- 'Rewards and Punishments,' i. 275
- Richards, J. L., letter from, to Maurice, with generous offer of assistance, i. 112
- Ritualism and the Ritualists, on, ii. 626
- Robertson's 'Life and Letters,' Maurice's appreciation of, ii. 508; attacks on by the Record, 512; proposal to expose the writers of them, 512-514; on the conversion of, from Evangelicalism, 514-516
- Roebuck, Mr., his remark regarding Maurice and Sterling, i. 77; reference to, 178
- Role, Dr., i. 35
- "Roman, the, and the Teuton," ii. 479
- Romanists and Protestants, the battle-cry that will rally, ii. 317
- Romanism, in Switzerland, i. 287; a way of adopting the best part of, into our system, 359; maudlin sentimentalism about, 365; on the craving for, caused by unreality and partisanship that had become prevalent among religious families, 422-424; on a State contributing money to those who teach, 432-434; remarks on, in connection with Gladstone's candidature at Oxford, 437; on a young clergyman on the point of going over to, 539; on the unsatisfactory nature of ordinary Anglo-Roman controversy and the one common ground, 580-583
- Romans, on the Epistle to the, i. 304, 375; contains the most profound exposition of the relation of the Spirit to Christ, ii. 351
- Romans, xi. 14, and ix. 3, 4, adaptation from, i. 212
- 'Romola,' Maurice impressed with, ii. 459
- Rose, Mr. Hugh, denounces German rationalism, i. 180, 182; suggests that Maurice should write for the 'Encyclopædia Metropolitana,' 185; rector of St. Thomas's, 199; disagrees with Dr. Pusey's views on repentance, 205; aids Maurice in obtaining the chaplaincy of Guy's Hospital, 235
- Rousseau's 'Contrat Social,' character of, i. 467
- Round, Mr., his candidature at Oxford, i. 437
- Rowe, Mr. John, i. 35
- Rowlatt, Mr., reader at the Temple, i. 356
- Ruskin, Mr., joins the staff of the Working Men's College, ii. 250, 251; references to, 66, 305, 421
- Russell, Lord John, his support of Dr. Hampden, i. 453
- Russell Square, Maurice removes to, in 1856, ii. 284

S

- SABBATH observance, on, ii. 144
- Sabbath, on the Christian and the Jewish, ii. 280-283; pamphlet on the, 294
- 'Sabbath Sermons,' ii. 149, 151
- Sacrament, on the nature of a, ii. 590; it cannot be "conceived," 590
- Sacraments as the means of Revelation, 494-496
- Sacrifice, on the ground of, ii. 253; Hare's pleasure in Maurice's book on, 256; the origin of it explained to Bunsen, 257; on the principle of, 384; on the fulness and perfection of Christ's, 393, 394
- 'Sacrifice, the Doctrine of, Deduced from the Scriptures,' ii. 237 n.
- Sack's review of the 'Kingdom of Christ,' i. 450
- St. Edward's, Cambridge, ii. 627-629, 636
- St. John, Maurice's objection to Leonardo da Vinci's conception of, ii. 554
- St. John's Epistles, value of a study of, i. 217; Maurice's book on, ii. 310
- St. John's Gospel, Maurice's book on, ii. 302
- St. Luke's, anecdote of a lunatic in, i. 163

- St. Paul, value of the study of the Epistles of, i. 217; and of his words concerning the revealing of Christ in him, 509
- St. Paul, on his Epistle to the Romans, i. 304, 375; ii. 351; his view of the order of the Resurrection, 561; reverence of Luther for, 602
- St. Paul's, Dean of, Milman, ii. 101, 200, 204
- St. Peter's, Vere Street, Maurice appointed to, ii. 361; storm raised by the Record because of this, 362; Maurice reads himself in, 377; publishes two sermons preached at, 377; contemplated resignation of, ii. chap. xiii.; resigns his charge at, 593; his farewell sermon at, 593
- "Saints," Maurice's objections to Calvinistic, High Church, literary, and scientific, ii. 536
- 'Saint's Tragedy,' correspondence with Kingsley regarding, i. 443, 446, 448; Maurice desires the withdrawal of his name from the, ii. 32
- Salters' Hall, great meeting of Baptists, Independents, and Presbyterians at, in 1719, i. 3
- Salvation and eternal death, Hare's view of Maurice's opinion regarding, ii. 183
- Saturday Review*, Maurice disclaims writing for, ii. 299; the latest and most triumphant incarnation of the "we" spirit, 322; references to, 381, 385, 439, 479, 514, 515, 552, 617
- Saunders, Mr., of Bristol, his account of a "bolstering match" among Mr. M. Maurice's pupils, i. 9
- Sceptic, letter to a young, i. 383-385; letter to another, ii. 477
- Schelling, his preface to Cousin's 'Nouveaux Fragments Philosophiques,' importance of, as an antidote to Rationalism, i. 289; his works, 468
- Schiller, i. 63
- Schimmelpennick, Mrs., i. 11
- Schleiermacher, Maurice's opinion of, i. 453; and of Thirlwall's translation of his work on St. Luke, 453, 454
- Schwabe, Mr. Salis, Maurice's reply to a letter of, ii. 46-49; reference to, 50
- Science, Rev. A. J. Scott's lectures on certain aspects of, i. 322, 323
- 'Science, The Claims of the Bible and,' ii. 451; Maurice's attitude towards, 608
- Scotch Calvinism, on the reformation of, 347
- Scotch "Free Church," how difficulties were dealt with in the, ii. 237
- Scott, Sir Walter, i. 65, 78
- Scott, Mr. A. J., visits Maurice at Guy's, i. 199; his tracts on the Will of God, and difficulty about Baptism, 208; letter to, from Maurice on the ground of human fellowship, 257; his lectures on certain aspects of science, 322, 323; references to, ii. 403, 404
- Scriptures, the. See Bible, the.
- Sectarianism, Maurice's horror of, i. 327; on the evils of, and the best mode of delivering from it, 513; the feeling of, is undermining the Church of England, ii. 300; the Communion the great witness against, 595
- Sects, Maurice's views on, i. 260; his life experience of, 337; his mode of regarding the truth to be found in 337; starting point of, curiously unlike what might be expected, ii. 327; all narrower and more cruel than the Church, 444; all teaching of, essentially secular, 586
- Secular education, on, and the secularists, ii. 610
- Self-discipline, on, i. 272
- Selfishness, or competition, not the law of life, ii. 32, 41
- Sellon, Miss, i. 504; Maurice in favour of, 508
- Selwyn, Rev. W., i. 322; votes for Maurice at Cambridge, ii. 545, 547; reference to, 553
- Septuagint, the, i. 225
- 'Serious Call,' Law's, i. 20
- Sermon, Maurice's farewell, at Vere Street, ii. 593-596
- Sermons, on the difficulty of preaching "intelligible," i. 334; the High Church principle about "reserve" in, 335; lack of reverence and depth in Evangelical, 335; Maurice endeavours to be practical in his own, 335; on the best mode of preparing, 374-376; value of studying the leading idea of an epistle in, 374; clergymen cannot preach, until God reveal Christ in them, 509
- Sewell, Mr., i. 185; persuades Maurice to allow himself to be named for the Professorship of Political Economy at Oxford, 210; his opinion of Carlyle, 280; his article on Carlyle, 293, 301
- Shairp, Principal, his report of a conversation with Mr. McLeod Campbell regarding Maurice's views on sin, ii. 538

- Shelley, i. 65, 78; Wordsworth's estimate of his poem on the Lark, 199
- Short, Bishop (of St. Asaph), his remark on Maurice's controversy with the Herald, i. 533; and on a meeting of the National Society, 546
- Short, Mr., Rector of Bloomsbury, i. 482
- Sick-beds, lessons learned at, no learning could teach, ii. 536
- Sin, Mr. McLeod Campbell's strange misconception of Maurice's view of, ii. 537-541; the guilt of, a tremendous reality was a fact he was continually insisting on, 539-541
- 'Sisters, Memorials of Two,' i. 131
- Slander, Short, Bishop of St. Asaph's, mode of dealing with, i. 533
- Slaney, Mr., his Committee of Inquiry on Christian Socialism, ii. 52; and its report, 53; his efforts on behalf of co-operation, 119-120; passing of his bill, 121
- Slavery, i. 37, 115; ii. 438, 439, 440, 460
- Smith, Goldwin, on his democracy, ii. 557
- Smith, Adam, and David Hume, i. 480
- Smith, Mr. i. 35
- Smith, Theyre, Mr., his character and acquirements, i. 410, 411
- Socialism in 1848, i. 457; effects of, in Paris, 458, ii. 13; a series of tracts on Christian, 33-36; Croker's view of, 72-74
- Socialist dinner, account of a, ii. 62
- Society, human relationships, not "capital" or "labour," the basis of, ii. 113-116
- Socinian, excitement caused among the English Presbyterians by one of their clergymen declaring himself a, i. 2
- Soldier, on the calling of the, ii. 417-420
- Sophocles, Julius Hare's exposition of the 'Antigone' of, i. 52, 53
- Solly, Mr., letter to, from Maurice, ii. 299
- Sorrow, on the effects of deep, ii. 145
- Southey, younger brother of, educated by Michael Maurice, i. 9; his lines on the battle of Blenheim, 15; references to, 65, 78; his views on Socialism, ii. 92, 94
- Spanish patriots, English expedition to assist, and Maurice's plea for, i. 85
- "Special Constable" demonstration, success of the, i. 472; Maurice proffers his service as a, 472
- Spectator*, ii. 82; denounces the action of the King's College Council, 211; references to, 471, 473, 479, 493, 598, 602, 605, 606, 619
- Spencer, Herbert, carries a step further the doctrines of Hamilton and Mansel, ii. 328; tone adopted by, towards all thought but his own, 608
- Spinoza, on his conception of a God, ii. 441
- Spiritual Bridegroom, on the idea of a, i. 446
- Spirit, Holy. See Holy Spirit
- "Spirit of a learner," Maurice's aspiration for the, the keynote of his life, ii. 67-69
- Spurgeon, Maurice on the preaching of, ii. 346
- Stanley, Lord (afterwards the late Lord Derby), carries the abolition of ten Irish bishoprics, i. 180
- Stanley, of Alderley, Lady, her remarks on Queen's College, and article on, i. 456 and n.
- Stanley, Rev. A., letter to, from Maurice, i. 391, 395, 401; his sermon on Maurice's death, ii. 67; reference to, 255; opposes Mansel, 340; letters to, 382, 428-430, 434; appointed Dean of Westminster, 435, 436; letters to, 478, 491; Maurice mistakes his feelings regarding the Articles, 506; Maurice's regard for, and opinion of, 601; declares himself "an Erastian of the Erastians," 601; his letter to the Spectator on the subject of Mr. Stephen's charge against a Broad Church leader, 602; letter to, 605; originates the title "Broad Church," 607 n.; administers the Communion to the Revisers at Westminster Abbey, 617; his sermon on the recovery of the Prince of Wales, 637
- Staël, Madame de, influence on Maurice of her 'L'Allemagne,' i. 176
- State education, Maurice opposed to, i. 277; on the scheme of state-supported education, in 1847, 432-434
- State, the, ought to be Conservative of individual rights, ii. 8; importance of the principle of the union of Church and, 8, 9; history and nature of the union between Church and, 584-586
- Stephen, Leslie, Mr., on Dean Mansel's assertion of the first principles of Agnosticism, ii. 327; his repugnance to Maurice's thoughts and works, 328; asserts that believers now repudiate Mansel's arguments, 339; his misconception of a statement of Maurice's, 535, 536; his article in Fraser on

- "Broad Churchmen," and the controversy its misstatements provoke, 599-609
- Stephenson, Mr., rector of Lympsham, 28; invites Maurice to reside with him, i. 139; mutual influence of, on Maurice and of Maurice on him, 146; memoir of, 147-152; his views on the prophecies, 150; on the ordinances of the Church and on Churchmanship, 151
- Stepney, Barber Beaumont's institution at, ii. 63, 64
- Sterling, Captain, confides the guardianship of his nieces to Maurice, ii. 194
- Sterling, John, his first acquaintance with Maurice, i. 52; his efforts in pushing him forward, 56; his acquaintance with J. S. Mill, 75; induces Maurice to accompany him into society, 76; their differences in point of opinion, 77; the expositor of Maurice's thoughts, 78; his connection with the ill-starred Anglo-Spanish expedition, 84; pledges himself to write a novel, 90; his marriage, 113; sends Colburn's offer to Maurice, 123; his opinion as to the condition of the slaves, 133; letter to Maurice conveying Coleridge's thoughts on 'Eustace Conway,' 164; Maurice's account of his friendship with, at Cambridge, 176; and of his preaching, 192; first indications of his illness, 195, 197; visits Maurice at Guy's, 199; his health and household, 226; seeks to promote the marriage of Maurice with his sister-in-law, 227; Maurice's expressions of regard for, 228; Maurice pleased with letters from, 256, 257; compares himself to Erasmus and Maurice to Luther, 256; his kindness to Maurice, 273; his article on Carlyle, 276; contributes to the Educational Magazine, 277; Maurice on, 279; death of his mother and wife, 336; Maurice's later intercourse with, 345-347; an illustration of this, 346; sudden relapse of, 366; Maurice's thoughts on, 367; slowly dying at Ventnor, 376; his interest in Law's answer to Mandeville's Fable of the Bees, 376; his death, 379; reflections on, 378-381; Hare's life of, 452; attacks on Hare's life of, 504; reply to, 505; reference to, 504; Maurice's account of his dealings with him in matters of belief, 505; a club falsely said to have been established in honour of, 516; newspaper attacks on, 532, 534; his inability to realise his own identity, 541; on Carlyle's Life of, 548; horrified at the Jewish wars, ii. 58
- Sterry, Maurice's respect for, i. 203
- Stewart, Maurice's dissatisfaction with, ii. 37
- Steward, the Lord High, election of, at Cambridge, i. 294-297
- Still-born child, on the death of a, i. 265
- Strachey, Mr. E. (afterwards Sir E. Strachey, Bart.), desires to become a pupil of Maurice's, i. 193; corresponds with him on the subject, 194-196; his illness, 196; proposed course of letters to, 196; suggestions to, for reading and study, 197; his reminiscences of Maurice's ordinary life at Guy's, 198 et seq.; his letters to his aunt, Lady Louis, on the teaching and moral and mental characteristics of Maurice, 202-204, 205 et seq.; letters to, from Maurice, 214-218, 222-224, 225, 251, 253, 260, 262, 266, 270-273, 275, 280, 281, 284; assists in editing the Educational Magazine during Maurice's absence in Switzerland, 284; letters to, 303, 304, 309, 311, 336, 350, 364, 387, 403, 426, 432-434, 462, 510-513; ii. 278, 355, 485
- Strafford, the Earl of, ii. 277
- Strauss, insurrection in Zürich against, i. 287, on the function of such men as, 349; and the Mythical School, on the theory of, ii. 455
- Study, considerations as to a course of, i. 215; importance of political science in, 216; representative authors in, 217; value of St. Paul's and St. John's Epistles and the Apocalypse in, 217, 218; order of reading in, 224; on a course of metaphysical and philosophical reading in, 463-469; on a course of philosophical reading in, ii. 37-39; on a course of, for acquiring a knowledge of the Alexandrian Schools, 56, 57
- 'Subscription no Bondage,' i. 170, 173-184, 190, 269
- Subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles, a defence of liberty, i. 168; this view approved by the leaders of the Oxford party, 169; correspondence on the subject, 169-171; 'Subscription no Bondage,' 170-173; Maurice's subsequent account of the tract, 180-182; Julius Hare's opinion of it, 190-191;

- on conscientious, 396; Maurice's later views on, ii. 154, 155, 503-507
- Suffering, on the ordination of, i. 311; an evil redeemed by the, of Christ, ii. 258, 259
- Sunday observance, question regarding at the Working Men's College, ii. 290, 294, 318-321
- Sunday walking, anecdote of Maurice regarding, ii. 290
- Sully, the secretary of the Council of Promoters, proposes a Central Board Scheme, which Maurice refuses to join in, ii. 42-44
- Swedenborg, the character of, i. 82
- Switzerland, Maurice's visit to, i. 281, 284, 286; on the social and political aspect of, 287
- Symbols, on the power of divine, i. 340

T

- 'TABLET,' its attacks on Maurice and his associates, ii. 84
- Tacitus, i. 217
- Tait, A. C., becomes Bishop of London, ii. 370. See London, Bishop of.
- Talandier, M., and the Working Men's College, ii. 268-271
- Taylor, Isaac, Rev., letter to, from Maurice, ii. 357-361
- Taylor, William, of Norwich, a connection of the Maurices, i. 9
- Teaching, preaching, and learning, Maurice's defence of his principles of, ii. 225-228
- Teaching staff of the Working Men's College at different periods, ii. 305
- Temple, Maurice's objections to becoming a candidate for the Mastership of the, i. 410; character and ability of Theyre Smith, the Assistant Preacher at, 410, 411
- Temple, on Sterling's preaching at the, i. 192
- Tennemann's (Cousin's) 'History of Philosophy,' i. 199, 202
- Tennyson, Alfred, ii. 30; Maurice becomes godfather to his child, 143; his lines of sympathy to Maurice, 212; signs the address sent to Maurice, 372
- Tertullian on "Præscription," i. 466
- Testimony, on the prevalent worship of mere, ii. 510
- Tetley, Dr., his love for Maurice, i. 536
- 'Teutons and Romans.' See 'Roman, the, and the Teuton.'
- Thales, i. 275
- 'Theological Essay,' publication of, ii. 156 n., 164 et seq.; storm raised by, 176 et seq.; discussion provoked by, 233, 544
- "Theology," distinction made by Maurice between "religion" and, i. 86; on the, and faith of woman, 86; its place as the scientia scientiarum, 371; the knowledge of God, 372, 373; on the connection between the Christian and Hindoo, 384; the foundation on which all other studies stand, ii. 136; the vocation of a professor of, is to show the connection of all other studies with, 136, 137; injury done to the study of, by the apologists, 437; English theology has been reconstructing itself on the commercial bases, 460; what the age is crying for, 493; the theology of the English Church larger and deeper than the current, 599
- Thessalonians, on a passage in, regarding Christ's second coming, ii. 561
- Thirlwall, Bishop, Maurice's admiration for his 'Charge,' in 1842, i. 336; speech of, 368; his translation of Schleiermacher's book on St. Luke, 454; gives the 'Declaration' its quietus, ii. 470
- Thirty-Nine Articles, subscription to the, a defence of liberty, i. 168; this view approved by the leaders of the Oxford party, 169; subscription to, no bondage, 170, 173 et seq.; at Oxford subscription to, before matriculation, 180; on the use and abuse of the, 181; to build a foundation of shams on a ground plan of the, 340; Ward's opinion of the, 390; Maurice's, 390; on conscientious subscription to the, 396; Maurice's reverence for the, 399; and estimate of the value of the, 524; his subsequent view of the, ii. 154; and of subscription to, 154, 155; always purposed to stand on the, 170, 175; importance of the, as against private judgment, 214, 228; on the advantage of their having been composed in the 16th century, 399, 401; on the value of the, 503-507; references to the, 503, 504; Mr. Leslie Stephen's misrepresentation of Maurice's view of, 600; why no dogma on the infallibility of the Scriptures appears in the, 602; reverence of the for the Scriptures, 603; the Living Word the ground of the, 603; Maurice explains

- his view of and defends the, 603; they form the groundwork of more comprehensive humanity and a more spiritual theology than created them, 603, 604
- Thirty-nine Articles, The Doctrine of the, ii. 377
- Thompson, Dr., of Trinity, his remark regarding Maurice, ii. 4; votes for him at Cambridge, 545
- Thomson, Dr. (Archbishop of York) elected preacher of Lincoln's Inn, ii. 315; his opinion of Mansel's lectures, 333
- 'Thoughts on the Rule of Conscientious Subscription,' i. 395
- Thought, on the relation between English and German, i. 468; the anti-English school of, ii. 253
- "Thou" and "you," Maurice's distinction between, i. 248
- Thucydides, the study of, recommended, i. 217, 224; reference to, 541 n.
- Time and eternity, Maurice's idea as to, ii. 219
- Times*, the, on the election of Lord High Steward at Cambridge, i. 296; references to, ii. 60, 73, 250, 396, 439, 442, 453, 468, 487
- Toleration, Michael Maurice's opinion of, i. 7; Maurice on the principles of, ii. 384-386
- Tone, Wolfe, Maurice's article on, i. 74
- Tory and Whig, how Maurice agreed with both and differed from both, i. 485
- Tractarianism, Maurice's account of the rise of, i. 180
- Tractarians, an attempt to suppress the, i. 342; Maurice accused of being one of the, 353
- Tract XC.; protest of four Oxford Tutors against the doctrine of, i. 238; the contention of, regarding the Articles, ii. 442; allusion to, 505
- 'Tracts for Priests and People,' Ludlow's proposed programme, ii. 386; Maurice's reply, 387; their publication in two vols., 405; list of contributors, 405
- Tracts for the People—"Cambridge" or Hospital, i. 368; Maurice proposes a series on the model of the 'Political Register,' 461, 462; a series of, on Christian Socialism, ii. 33-36; another series by Christian Socialists of which the 'Duty of the Age' was to have been one, 126; a proposed 'Cambridge' series, 231
- Trades-unions, remarks on, ii. 116
- Trench, Hon. Mrs., letter to, on death of her child, i. 451
- Trench, Richard C., Rev. (afterwards Dean of Westminster and Archbishop of Dublin), i. 171; letters to from Maurice, 186-188, 192, 212, 233, 252, 257, 265, 276, 286, 304, 321, 367; Maurice much pleased with his book on the 'Sermon on the Mount,' 367; letters to, 380, 407, 420, 425; appointed to Professorship at King's College, 425; his loss of his child, 451; on Maurice's share in founding Queen's College, 456; illness of, 457; Maurice on the preaching of, 499; his fitness for the Divinity Chair at Cambridge, ii. 14; reference to, 176, 186; his letter to Maurice as Chairman of the Committee of Queen's College, 216; made Dean of Westminster, 300, 301; an alarmist, 383; appointed Archbishop of Dublin, 435; reference to his belief, 568
- Trinitarian, a, may be an atheist, ii. 447
- Trinity College, Cambridge, Maurice enters at, i. 44, 47; lectures at, 47, 48; election of the Trinity Union candidate, 49; system of study at, 50; Benthamism the prevalent faith at, in Maurice's time, 176; the appointment of Whewell to the mastership of, 320; its anti-divine character, 321
- Trinity Hall, Maurice enters, i. 59; Sterling follows him to, 60; reference to, 72, 73
- Trinity, i. 41, 175; to his father on, 132-138; see also 543; on the three Persons in the, and their actions on the spirit of man, ii. 349-355; see also, 384, 385; on the doctrine of the, and its definition, 388; as regarded by the fathers and mediæval writers, 413, 416; the "Eternal Charity," the "Eternal Love," 416; on the, 463; on the Article on the, 504; on the, in unity, 515, 569, 570, 641
- Trinity Sunday, on, i. 544; thoughts on, 413; ii. 520
- Truth, Maurice on the highest, and the faculty of recognising it being universal, i. 298; his reverence for, ii. 235; toleration based on the certainty of, 384; on the best mode of arriving at, ii. 391, 393, 456; on love as necessary to, 531.
- Tutor, Maurice on his qualifications as a, i. 194

U

- UNBELIEF, persecution the cause of, ii. 385
 Uniformity, Act of, effect of the, i. 1, 2, 6; on abolishing the, ii. 356-361
 Unitarianism, first appearance of, amongst the Presbyterians, i. 4, 5; influence of Priestley and Belsham in propagating, 5; most of the professors at the Puritan Academy of Hoxton under the influence of, 7; several of Michael Maurice's family renounce, 20, 22, 23; Milton's bent of mind towards, 64; to Maurice's boyish logic incoherent and feeble, 175; he despised it as weak, ii. 15; his knowledge of the evil of, and of the good beneath, 89; many of the professors of, now rising to a profound belief in the "Divine Unity," 351
 Unitarian, Maurice can be nothing but a, in the sense of seeking for unity, ii. 388; influence of Renan on a, 461-463
 Unitarians, the, and the principle involved in the Dissenters' Chapels Bill, i. 435, 436; tendency to reaction in, ii. 143
 Unity, Maurice's intense desire for, ii. 632
 Unsettled minds, the only proper mode of dealing with, ii. 226
 Universal Church, on the, i. 166; Maurice's desire for a, 206
 Universal redemption, view of the English and Scotch Churches as to, i. 183; universal restitution, 208; ii. 15, 18, 19, 23, 575, 576
 University, advantage of being educated at a, i. 223; duty of every Englishman of birth or property to attend a, 224
 "University Bill," the, for abolishing subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles, i. 168
 Universities, the, the true National Church councils in educational matters, i. 286
 Utilitarianism, Maurice's opposition to, i. 66, 80, 176

V

- VAUGHAN, Rev. D. J., letters to, from Maurice, ii. 234, 349, 379, 509
 Vere, Mr. de, letter to, from Maurice, i. 325
 Vernon, Mr., Baptist minister, i. 28
 Vinci, Leonardo da, Maurice's objection to his conception of St. John, ii. 551
 Vinet, professes a kind of non-juring

- doctrine, i. 287; his 'Manifestation des Croyances religieuses,' and what it teaches, ii. 429
 Voice, Maurice's loss of, i. 515
 Volney, i. 63
 Voysey judgment, Maurice's view of the, ii. 632

W

- WACE, Mr., reference to, ii. 615 and n.
 Warburton lecturer, Maurice appointed, i. 418; determines the subject of his first lecture to be the Epistle to the Hebrews, 419; reference to his lectures, 481; and to the appointment, 521
 Ward's, Mr., his "Ideal of a Christian Church," controversy regarding, i. 390, et seq.; his real sin, 400; his attack on Maurice, 400, 401; deprived of his degree, 401
 Wedding, present of books, Maurice's acknowledgment of a, i. 550
 Weddings and ordinations, on, i. 500
 Wellington, the Duke of, i. 15, 178, 180
 Westbury, Lord Chancellor, ii. 466, 506; said not to believe in hell, 564
 Westcott, Mr., his article on Comtism, ii. 578, 598
 Westminster, Dean of. See Stanley, Rev. A.
 Westminster Review, Maurice's contributions to, i. 74; article in the, on 'Essays and Reviews,' ii. 382.
 Whewell, Mr., his opinion of Carlyle, i. 280; his appointment to the mastership of Trinity College, 320; remarks on by Maurice, 477; ii. 37; reference to, 212; his title of the chair to which Maurice was appointed at Cambridge, 552
 Whig and Tory, how Maurice sympathised with, and differed from both, i. 485
 White, Blanco, i. 51, 423, 504
 Whitehead, i. 322
 Whit Sunday, thoughts on, i. 543
 Whitsuntide, on the season of, i. 412; blessings of, ii. 519; associations connected with, 520
 Wife, on the qualities deemed desirable in a, i. 204; on the help derived from a, 240
 Wilberforce, Rev. Mr., denies Protestantism means anything, i. 140 Wilberforce, Rev. S. (afterwards Archdeacon of Surrey, Bishop of Oxford and Bishop of Winchester), Maurice's first acquaintance with, i. 238; addresses

- his letters to, 239; his character, 239; death of his wife, 304; remarks on, 350, 351; letter to Maurice on Ward's case, 395; references to, 414, 533, 547; ii. 179, 182, 194; fate of his "formula concordia," 201; reference to, 203; his article on 'Essays and Reviews,' 382, 383; Maurice on the unbelief of it, 390; Maurice's increasing distrust of, 406; references to, 467, 506; on the rhetoric of, 568; sneers of, at the scientific men for maintaining what they believed to be truths, 608
- Wilberforce, the elder, i. 35
- Wilson, Mr. George, editor of the Globe, i. 199
- Winkworth, Miss, her translation of German hymns, Maurice's delight in, ii. 638
- Women, on the theology and faith of, i. 86; classes for, started at the Working Men's College, ii. 260
- Woollcombe, Mr. (afterwards Archdeacon of Barnstaple), letter to, from Maurice, on taking Orders under an inadequate sense of feeling, i. 245-248
- Wolstenholme, Miss, her essay on the education of girls, ii. 592.
- Word of God, tendency of the clergy to give the Scripture the title of, ii. 603
- Word, on the Divine, see i. 237; ii. 330, 331, 338, 452, 469, 500; upholds the existence of the devil, ii. 21; all reference to, omitted by Pan-Anglican Conference, 566; the Broad Church and, 603, 604
- Word, the Living, the ground of the Articles, ii. 603
- Words, on the power of, i. 526; how Maurice endeavoured to ascertain the meaning of the, of an author, ii. 541, n.
- Wordsworth, Dr. at a National Society meeting, i. 546
- Wordsworth, on the egotism of, i. 65; sketch of, 78; Maurice defends the poetry of, 176; on Wordsworth, Shelley, and Chatterton, 199; speech on the day of the death of, 317; on his 'Prelude,' ii. 59. Confer with this passage to explain it, i. 215, "I believe," &c., 246, "To learn," &c., and 171, 172
- Work, on the seeming vanity of all earthly, when yet nothing has been in vain, ii. 247
- Working classes, D. Macmillan's letters to Hare on the state of the, i. 288, 329; Maurice proposes to address a series of tracts to, 330, 331; Cambridge or hospital tracts for the, 368; a series of weekly tracts for the, 463, 471; Maurice's desire for meetings of the, 513; meetings with the, 536-539, 542, 544, 549; co-operation and Christian Communism begin to be discussed at, ii. 6-11; their feeling of hostility to an imaginary God, 57; conferences with the, resumed, 112, 113; on the trades unions of the, 113-116
- Working Men of London, address from the, to Maurice, ii. 221-223
- Working Men's Association, organisation of the first, ii. 40; the Council of Promoters, 40, 41; Maurice's views of the principles which should regulate, 40, 41
- Working Men's College, first idea of, ii. 221, 232; Maurice draws up a scheme for, 233; amount derived from Maurice's lectures on behalf of, 239; classes for ladies started at, 260; two French Republican refugees excluded from the Council of, 268-271; its freedom from religious tests, 304; progress of the College, and list of its teachers, 304-306; proposal to make it a joint-stock company, 307; objections to this, 307; the scheme is abandoned, 309; secession of some members, 309; Maurice delivers a course of lectures on the Epistles of St. John at, 310; the Sunday question at, 318-321; closing of the women's classes at, 379; a meeting at the, to congratulate Mr. Hughes on his election for Lambeth, 501; meeting at, to congratulate Maurice on his appointment to Cambridge, 551; a letter to, "On Secular and Denominational Education," 612; Maurice's good-bye to, 633
- 'Working, on Learning and,' ii. 239
- 'World, the Religions of the,' i. 430
- Worsley, Dr., Master of Downing, i. 210
- Wynn, Miss, reference to two of her letters, ii. 315; letters to, from Maurice, 316, 346, 382, 463-465, 511, 569, 575, 576, 578

X

XENOPHON, i. 217

Y

'YEAST,' Maurice's opinion of, ii. 58; reference to, 59

"You" and "thou," Maurice and Hare on, i. 248

ANECDOTES: A bolstering match, i. 9; Maurice as a boy and Southey's lines on Blenheim, 15; Cathon's 'Birds' and the 'Book of Trades,' 18; "It wains," 30; Betsy Norgrove's stories of the boy's reading and of the plum, 33; "His intentions are excellent," 33; the flower and the biscuit, 33; a cousin's picture, 34; Dr. Goodene's anecdotes, 39 et seq.; the pledge, 40; the bull and the hat, 40; the silk-stocking device, 41; Mr. Beales, M.A., and B. H. Kennedy, 49; Mr. Kearsay and Maurice, 71; Mr. Ebden's account of his cancelling his name on the college books, 73; Fanny Kemble, Maurice, the donkey, and the elephant, 77; Mr. Roebuck on Sterling and Maurice, 77; the three novels, 90; Maurice nearly frozen, 104; Maurice "in a pucker," Mr. Gladstone's account, 109; Mrs. Maurice's account of the Southampton riots, 114; and of the Irvingite miracles, 116; Robert Hall, Michael Maurice, and the Trinity, 123; Dr. Johnson's account of a walk on the Tripas day, 131; Captain Marryat and 'Eustace Conway,' 163; Coleridge and 'Eustace Conway,' 165; the Apostles' Club and 'Eustace Conway,' 165; other anecdotes as to, 166; a walk to Clapham, 186; "The world is out of joint," 198; Wordsworth, Shelley, and Chatterton, 199; anecdotes of Mrs. F. Maurice, 229; Maurice lectures on English Literature, various anecdotes by Archdeacon Farrar, 314-317; anecdote by Dr. Barry, 318; a dinner-party of Carlyle, Sterling, Maurice, &c., 316; Mr. Hughes' introduction by Maurice, "A very good fellow for cricket," &c., 483; a Governesses' Institution dinner, 514; Bishop Short on the mode of dealing with newspaper criticism, 533, a magic-lantern party, 543; "tossing Bishop Short in a blanket," 547; "He left us trembling," ii. 3; θεῖον τε πάθος, 4; Mr. Tom Hughes and those who hissed the Queen, 10; the first Socialist dinner, 31; Miss Fox, account of a Socialist meeting, 62; James Marshall's dinner party and Maurice's correction of the two M.P.'s, 63; the English Review and Maurice, 70; a certain Record writer and Maurice, 71; Maurice tears up a letter given him to deliver, 76: "I won't be 'Maliei any more," 106; Μορφή, 126; "The Duty of the Age," and Maurice's veto, 127; Maurice's "cholera of resignations," 172; the Secretary and the Bishop's letters and the pamphlets, 196, 197; the suppressed letters of two bishops, and the preacher of Lincoln's Inn, 200, 201; Maurice receives the news of a kindly article, 210; Maurice's breakfast-parties, 284; the "shou-shou" of his tub, 285; the effect of suddenly entering his room, 285; poison in the pot, 286; his habit of dictation, 286; the poker and the pillow, 286; his "black wife," 287; the erasure of MSS., 287; Maurice and the beggars, 287; "Monsieur, je suis humilié," 288; the run from the doorstep, 288; Maurice and the costermongers, 289; Maurice in the omnibus, 289; Maurice's doing good by stealth, 289; fasting, 290; "That was not what we wanted," 290; "Mighty fine if ye h'aint nothing to do," 291; the maid and Maurice's boots, 292; the lady of the Record and Maurice, 292; the rubbing of his hands, 294; Maurice's horror of slavery causes him incidentally to save a large sum of money, 378; Robert Hall and the David, 403; the meeting of Maurice and Colenso, 422; the effect on Maurice of Mr. Bunyon's letter, 433; Maurice's sub-tenant, the carpenter, and the surrender of the lease, 437; Maurice "on fire" at Mr. Kempe's, 457; purging the cathedral of Genoa of Renan, 463; Bishop Thirlwall and the Oxford Declaration, 470; "Is man an ape or an angel?" 492; Maurice and the Bribery Bill, 493 and 520; Maurice's 'Godless Natural History,' 534; the bed-ridden old woman and Punch, 535; Maurice and those who competed with him, 545; anecdotes of moral courage, 546, 547; the scene at the Working Men's College on December 8th, 1866, 550, 551; Mr. Kingsley's story of Maurice on Leonardo da Vinci, 554; of Maurice and Stanley, 601; Maurice and those who tried to get him clerical promotion, 616; Maurice with little children, 629; Maurice with undergraduates and young lady visitors, 630; Maurice and his servants, 630; "addled eggs," 631; Maurice and his little grandchild, 636 the last days, 637-641

WORKS BY FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE, M.A.,

Late Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Cambridge.

The following Books are now issued at a uniform price of 6s. each volume.

THE KINGDOM OF CHRIST.

New Edition. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 12s.

THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE GOSPEL OF ST. JOHN.

A Series of Discourses. Crown 8vo. 6s.

SOCIAL MORALITY.

Second and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE PROPHETS AND KINGS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE EPISTLES OF ST. JOHN.

Second and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

EXPOSITORY SERMONS ON THE PRAYER-BOOK,

Considered especially in reference to the Romish system; and on the Lord's Prayer. New Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

SEQUEL TO THE INQUIRY, "WHAT IS REVELATION?"

Letters in reply to Mr. Mansel's Examination of "Strictures on the Bampton Lectures." Crown 8vo. 6s.

THEOLOGICAL ESSAYS.

Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE DOCTRINE OF SACRIFICE DEDUCED FROM THE SCRIPTURES.

New Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

SERMONS PREACHED IN COUNTRY CHURCHES.

Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

MACMILLAN AND CO., LONDON.

WORKS BY FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE, M.A.
(CONTINUED.)

The following volumes are now published at 4s. 6d. each.

THE CONSCIENCE.

Lectures on Casuistry. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

DIALOGUES OF FAMILY WORSHIP.

Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

THE PATRIARCHS AND LAW-GIVERS OF
THE OLD TESTAMENT.

Sixth Edition. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

THE RELIGIONS OF THE WORLD, and their Relations to Christianity.

Fifth Edition. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

LEARNING AND WORKING.

Six Lectures on the Foundation of Colleges for Working Men.
Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

LAW'S REMARKS on the FABLE OF THE BEES.

With Introduction by F. D. MAURICE, M.A. Fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

THE FRIENDSHIP OF BOOKS, and other Lectures.

Edited, with Preface, by THOMAS HUGHES, Author of "Tom Brown's Schooldays." Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

The undermentioned works are now issued at the prices named.

MORAL AND METAPHYSICAL PHILOSOPHY.

Vol. I.—Ancient Philosophy and the First to the Thirteenth Centuries. Vol. II.—Fourteenth Century and the French Revolution, with a Glimpse into the Nineteenth Century.
Third Edition. 2 vols. 8vo. 16s.

ON THE SABBATH DAY; the Character of the Warrior; and on the Interpretation of History.

Fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

THE LORD'S PRAYER, THE CREED, AND
THE COMMANDMENTS.

A Manual for Parents and Schoolmasters. To which is added the order of the Scriptures. 18mo. 1s.

MACMILLAN AND CO., LONDON.

122-123

[illegible]

CARR McLEAN, TORONTO FORM #38-297

BX 5199 .M3 A5 1884
Maurice, Frederick Deniso
The life of Frederick Denison

v.2.c.1
010101000

0 1163 0077169 2
TRENT UNIVERSITY

BX5199 .M3A5 1884 v.2

Maurice, Frederick Denison,
1805-1872

The life of Frederick

378006

